I confess I do not subscribe to this idea. The truth about the matter is, while the construction of these railroads may have contributed to the more rapid development of the country, it is furthermore true that the same spirit which developed the great thermore true that the same spirit which developed the great Mississippi Valley during the first fifty years of this century would have constructed the railroads to the Pacific Ocean and would have developed our Western domain.

And then, again, I thoroughly concur with my friend from Texas [Mr. Bell], that giving subsidies to these railroad schemes has had an evil tendency, fostered paternalism, and given birth to ideas which are dangerous to our institutions. I attach no importance to the sentimental view of this question.

On the other hand, there is another view of it which might be

On the other hand, there is another view of it which might be called the popular side. It goes to the effect that the men who constructed these railroads were in point of fact public robbers; that they misappropriated a very large amount of public moneys, and that they ought to be held accountable in the courts of justice for the wrongs they have committed. I confess I have no sympathy with this view of the case.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield for a moment? Mr. Chairman, I ask that we have order in the House. It is difficult

The CHAIRMAN. All gentlemen will be seated and cease conwersation.

Mr. PATTERSON. It is entirely useless to discuss wrongs before this House for which there is no remedy in the courts; and I am thoroughly of the opinion, and the majority of the committee concur in that opinion, that there are no wrongs, however greedy the proportions of these enterprises may have been, which can be the promoters of these enterprises may have been, which can be corrected by the United States in any court of justice. The truth about the matter is the Government of the United States lent its bonds to these railroad companies and took a security from these companies for their payment, and there is no trust relation between the Government and the promoters of these enterprises. No right of action has accrued on the part of the Government. And when Llay down these level precedition in this way. I have there right of action has accrued on the part of the Government. And when I lay down these legal propositions in this way I am thoroughly in accord with the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the United States against The Union Pacific Railroad Company, reported in 98 United States Reports. I am in thorough accord with the opinion given this committee by the Attorney-General of the United States. We have no legal rights, so far as wrongs complained of are concerned, against the promoters of this enterprise. For whatever wrongs were committed, if they were accountable at all they were accountable to the companies and the stockholders of the companies, and not to the United States. not to the United States.

Now, for the purposes of what I am about to say, I shall treat the entire line extending from the Missouri River to San Jose, Cal., and from Kansas City to the three hundred and ninety-third milepost out west as one line, simply for the reason that the same laws and the same conditions are precisely applicable to both lines. Now, the facts are that these various lines of subsidized railroads amount to 2,293.4 miles. This embraces neither the terminal facilities at Omaha, Denver, Ogden, Kansas City, nor San Francisco.

Again, the first-mortgage bonds on these 2,293 miles of railroad amounted to $61,385,000. The Government bonds loaned to these railroad companies amounted to $61,395,680. Now, mark you, these subsidy bonds were not the bonds of the railroad companies. They were the bonds of the United States Government, loaned to them; and the only security which the Government of the United States took was a second mortgage on these 2,293 miles of railroad; and the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case referred to, so holds—that this was the security, and the only security, which the Government had for the payment of this loan.

Mr. BOATNER. What case does the gentleman refer to?
Mr. PATTERSON. It is the case of the Union Pacific Railroad Company against The United States, reported in 98 United States Reports. I called the case a moment ago.

Reports. I called the case a moment ago.

Now I desire to call attention to the fact that the incumbrance Now I desire to call attention to the fact that the incumbrance on these lines amounted to $53,545 per mile, and it is no wonder that these two railroad companies in the rapid construction of their lines lapped as described by my friend from Vermont [Mr. Powers]. It is no wonder, I say, that each of these companies should have been anxious to construct as many miles of railroad as possible under these conditions, and I have no doubt that the promoters of these enterprises, out of the opportunity given them by the Government, made very large sums of money.

The next fact to which I desire to call attention is this: By the acts of 1862 and 1864 the Congress provided that one-half the compensation paid by the Government to these railroad companies for transportation should go into the Treasury of the United States transportation should go into the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of raising a fund sufficient to meet the interest annually accruing upon the bonds of the Government, and 5 per cent of the net earnings of the companies was to go into a sinking fund for the purpose of redeeming the bonds at maturity. This provision, deemed at the time ample to protect the Government, became wholly insufficient by reason of the rapid decline in freight rates, in passenger rates, and in the compensation for carticles. rying the mails, army stores, and all other supplies transported by these railroads on account of the Government. The interest at 6 per cent remained, but all these charges were greatly diminished, and the high rate of interest and the constant diminution in the amounts paid by the Government to the companies brought about anounts paid by the Government to the companies brought about a condition of affairs which made this provision wholly inadequate for the purposes originally in view. Thereupon an effort was made on the part of the Government, by a suit against the railroad companies, to enforce the collection of the interest which it had paid upon its bonds, but the Supreme Court of the United States held in 1875, that the Government having and States held, in 1875, that the Government having made such provision as it had deemed sufficient to meet the interest upon the bonds it had loaned to the companies, no interest matured until the maturity of the bonds themselves, and that therefore the companies were not liable in that suit. Thereupon, in 1878, Judge Thurman introduced his act, which became a law. Instead of requiring but half the compensation due from the Government to the railroad companies to be paid into the Treasury, that act required that the whole of it should be paid in, one-half to go to the interest account and the other half to go into the sinking fund for the purpose of retiring the bonds. It provided, furthermore, that the 5 per cent of net earnings which was to go into the sinking fund under the acts of 1862 and 1864 should still be paid, and then it provided that if the entire compensation and that 5 per vision as it had deemed sufficient to meet the interest upon the then it provided that if the entire compensation and that 5 per cent should not equal 25 per cent of the net earnings of the road, then the companies should pay a sum not exceeding $850,000 in addition, so as to make the amount which would go into the Treasury annually equal to at least 25 per cent of the net earnings of the railroads.

Let us see how this account stands with the Government of the United States. The Government mortgages, as I have stated, amount to $61,395,680. The interest which had accumulated up to the 1st day of January, 1897, amounted to the enormous sum of $106,557,125, making the entire debt due to the Government of the United States from these companies $168,152,805. But in the meantime, under the acts of 1862 and 1864, and also under the Thurman Act, a fund was accumulating in the Treasury to the credit of these railroad companies and it amounted to $56,755,394; which, taken from the gross sum, leaves a net balance on the 1st day of January, 1897, of $111,396,411 due to the Government of the United States. Now, when you add to this the $61,385,000, the amount of the first-mortgage bonds which rest upon this property, you have an aggregate of $172,702,411 of incumbrance on these 2,293 miles of railroad. That amounts to $75,352 a mile, without embracing the terminal facilities at any of the points along the entire route.

Mr. BOATNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?
Mr. PATTERSON. I would rather not. I requested at the beginning that I should not be interrupted, and I prefer not to be.
Mr. BOATNER. Very well.

Mr. PATTERSON. Now, the question is, Mr. Chairman, What is the Government going to do with this enormous indebtedness which is due to it of $111,000,000? We ought to look at it as a business question. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that we must take one of two alternatives. It means the foreclosure of the mortgage upon these railroad companies and the Government ownership of this entire line or it means a settlement with the existing railroad this entire line or it means a settlement with the existing railroad companies. I desire to say that, so far as I am concerned, my face is set like flint against any proposition which looks to the Government ownership of a mile of railroad in this Republic. [Applause.] I would, so far as I am concerned, rather see this entire debt canceled than to see the Government engaged in the operation of a railroad. I have done what I could since I entered public life to take the Government out of the banking business, and I now enter my protest against the Government going into and I now enter my protest against the Government going into the railroad business.

If we go into a settlement with these companies, we must go into it intelligently and on terms which will enable them to liquidate ultimately this enormous debt due the Government. the very first remark I wish to make in this connection is that time is an important and essential element of the transaction. There is not a railroad in the United States, so far as my observation extends, on which a mortgage does not rest. The whole system of building railroads in the United States consists in placing mortgages upon these properties for long terms of years and then paying the interest upon those mortgages semiannually out of the incomes of the roads.

The fact is that these bonds have matured or are about to mature, and this whole indebtedness, amounting to $172,000,000, is now practically due. The only way in which we can take care of that indebtedness is to do as is done in every other similar case extend the time by placing bonds upon the property at such a rate of interest as will enable the companies, within the limitations prescribed, to pay the interest and to pay ultimately the principal of the indebtedness.

In this connection, I submit that it is very important to embrace in the security of the Government not only the 2,293 miles of railroad extending from the Missouri River to San Jose, but all the other properties of these companies, embracing about 1,000 additional miles of railroad, and also the terminal facilities at Omaha, Kansas City, Denver, Ogden, and San Francisco. These lines, having been constructed in conjunction with the roads of those companies, are important in the progress of their administration; and it is very material that the mortgage of the Government should extend so as to embrace the entire mileage of the companies and all their facilities for transportation.

As to the additional security, in respect to the Central Pacific Railroad, the mortgage extends over 442 miles of railroad not embraced in the aided line, and the railroad running into San Francisco and all the terminal facilities at San Francisco and Oakland. There is one important fact in this connection to which I desire to call attention, and it is that the fixed charges upon this additional mileage of railroads are being paid to-day by the Central Pacific Company. There is no default in the payment of interest. The Central Pacific Railroad Company has paid the interest at maturity upon these liens; and as, under the provisions of the bill, the first mortgage is to be reduced so that the bonds shall bear a rate of interest not exceeding 5 per cent, it is safe to say bear a rate of interest not exceeding 5 per cent, it is safe to say that the mortgage extending over these terminal facilities and this additional mileage of 442 miles will be an additional security and better for the Government. In addition to this, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company indorses this contract for the Central Pacific Railroad Company and guarantees the payment of all the obligations assumed by it under the proposed settlement.

In respect to the Union Pacific Railroad, I regret that my friend from Iowa [Mr. Henderson] is not in his seat, because since he put the question to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Powers] yesterday I have looked a little more carefully into the matter he referred to. The Union Pacific Railroad proposes to embrace in the mortgage the line of road beginning 393 miles from Kansas City, which extends to Denver and from Denver to the junction on the main line at Chevenne a distance of 281 miles. It is proposed the main line at Cheyenne, a distance of 381 miles. It is proposed to put that property into this settlement at the rate of $17,500 a mile. In other words, while this part of the line is just as important as the 393 miles east and is to all intents and purposes a part of the main line and is just as valuable, it goes into the arrangement at the rate of $17,500 a mile, while the mortgage upon the main line amounts to more than $25,000 a mile.

Again, there are 194 miles of branch lines, and these go into the

Again, there are 194 miles of branch lines, and these go into the arrangement at a valuation of only $8,000 per mile. Then there are the bridge at Omaha, the terminal properties at Omaha, Kansas City, Denver, and Ogden, together with the lands, which, in my judgment, are not worth $16,000,000 or anything like that sum. On that proposition I agree with my friend from Texas [Mr. Bell]. Then there is the equipment, amounting to $1,400,000. All these are embraced in the settlement and are to be covered by the proposed mortgage to the Government.

Let us see how it will work. The interest charges on the unaided and aided line belonging to the Union Pacific system amounts to $3,323,300 annually. Under this bill the mortgage bonds provided for in this settlement are to bear a rate of interest not exceeding 4 per cent. Now, when the first mortgage is placed upon all these properties, including all the terminal facilities, the interest charges annually will amount to $2,171,520; that is to say, there will be an annual reduction of $1,151,780.

The present annual interest charge upon the first-mortgage bonds on the aided portions of these roads is $2,011,920, whereas interest charges upon the subsidized lines of the Union Pacific Railroad under the proposed bill will amount only to $1,341,280, or a saving of $670,640 in favor of the Government. The present annual interest charge of $2,110,920 will be increased under the operation of the bill to $2,271,520. In other words, the entire interest charges upon all the property of the Union Pacific, including the aided and the unaided portions of the line and all the terminal facilities, will be only $160,000 more annually than it is to-day on the aided portion alone.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PATTERSON. I would like very much to be permitted to

Mr. PATTERSON. I would like very finder to be permitted to proceed for a few minutes longer.

Mr. POWERS. I yield to the gentleman ten minutes longer.

Mr. PATTERSON. As I was saying, on the aided portion of the roads the interest on the first-mortgage bonds accruing now is within $160,000 of the amount of the entire interest that will be paid on the first-mortgage bonds, embracing all of the aided and unaided portions of the lines, and all the terminal facilities at all

mr. HERMANN. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. PATTERSON. I would prefer not to yield at present.

Mr. HERMANN. I only wish to ask the gentleman what remedy the Government reserves in the bill in the event of default of payment of the semiannual interest by the railroad?

Mr. PATTERSON. I was just coming to that point, and my friend anticipates only for a moment what I have to say.

On the point I am just leaving, I submit that it is a substantial increase of the security of the Government, and the security of the Government is greatly strengthened by the proposed settle-

But there is another view of the question to which I wish to call the attention of the committee. It is this: There are embraced in the bill 1,017 miles of additional railroad. On these lines the Government transports its troops, its mails, its supplies, its munitions of war, and everything that the Government needs to transport in the country through which the lines run. Therefore the compensation which the Government pays these two railroads is very largely increased by means of the inclusion of these unaided lines and terminal facilities in its mortgage.

And now to the point, to which my friend from Oregon called

And now to the point to which my friend from Oregon called my attention. In the event the railroad companies make default in the payment of the interest, under the provisions of the bill the President of the United States has the right to retain the entire compensation otherwise to be paid by it to the railroad companies, and it is to be instantly covered into the Treasury to protect the Government from loss.

Mr. HERMANN. Does the same remedy extend to the non-payment of the principal at the rate of $1,000 a day as fixed in the bill?

Mr. PATTERSON. The same, precisely. In other words, the remedy that the Government has for the nonpayment of the principal and semiannual payment of the interest, as provided in the bill, is that the Government can stop payment of any compensation to the companies for transportation; and this includes not only the compensation accruing upon the aided lines, but also upon the unaided lines. And, Mr. Chairman, not only do we stop that by the provisions of the bill on account of the failure to make the required payments on the principal, but we stop it also on account of the default in the payment of the semiannual interest. So that in either event the Government is amply protected.

Mr. HERMANN. What lien does the Government retain for

Mr. HERMANN. What hen does the Government retain for the charges which have accrued in the meantime?

Mr. PATTERSON. As long as the companies pay their semi-annual interest into the Treasury of the United States and the sum required to be paid annually on the principal the Government will pay them for the transportation of its troops, supplies, mails, and munitions of war, just like it would pay any other corporation for such services. poration for such services

One other point and I will conclude. We required the railroad companies to come before the committee and submit a statement of the gross and net earnings of the road for the preceding five years. It was perfectly apparent to the committee that these companies could not carry out this arrangement if as much as 3 per cent was imposed in the way of interest on the debt, and while the companies might make an annual payment on the principal, and semiannually pay 2 per cent interest on this enormous indebt-edness, it was clear that they could not go beyond those figures. Now, I have stated to the House the reasons which have influ enced my judgment in coming to the conclusion that I ought to support this bill. I desire to say in conclusion that the committee gave the most careful and painstaking investigation to the subject. They have listened to arguments both for and against the propostion. The committee have gone to all of the sources of informa-tion that were available, and I shall vote for this measure believing that if it be enacted into a law these companies will accept and comply with the terms of settlement.

I will vote for it because under all the circumstances I believe it to be the best settlement we can make for the Government. We are not responsible for the conditions which confront this Con-They have come down to us from the last generation. can only deal with them as they are, and do that which we believe to be best for the country.

I yield the balance of my time, if I have any remaining, to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Powers].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has three minutes remaining.

Mr. POWERS. I suggest that the gentleman from Missouri

Mr. HUBBARD. I yield an hour and thirty minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HARRISON], with the privilege of distributing that time as he pleases.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. Grow having taken The committee informally rose; and Mr. Grow having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed the bill (H. R. 9700) authorizing the issuing and loaning of the ensigns, flags, signal numbers, etc., of the United States for the purpose of decorating the streets of Washington on the occasion of inaugural ceremonies on the 4th of March, 1897.

PACIFIC RAILROAD BILL.

The committee again resumed its session.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. NORTHWAY. Will the gentleman come over this way, so that he can be heard?

Mr. HARRISON. I should like very much to accommodate the gentleman, but I have some papers before me which I desire to use in my argument. If I am not heard, however, I will change my ostition.

Mr. Chairman, I agree with the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Pacific Railroads [Mr. Powers] in believing that this is a great business proposition. I further agree with him that the time for action has come. But, Mr. Chairman, I do not and can not agree with him and the majority of the committee in believing that the bill now pending is the remedy or is such action as Congress should adopt as a settlement of this important business transaction, a transaction involving, as we have been told, $110,000,000 or $112,000,000.

I propose, Mr. Chairman, first briefly to submit my reasons why I believe the report of the majority should not be adopted. I must do so rapidly, for a number of my colleagues and associates desire to be heard, and I have consented to divide my time with three or four other gentlemen.

First, I say that the proposition embraced in the report of the majority is too liberal to the railroad companies. I agree with my friend and colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Bell], who so eloquently showed this committee on yesterday that the owners of these railroads have not so acted in the past as to entitle them to any further privileges or favors at the hands of the American Government. Yet I have no harsh words for them. Mr. Chairman, I propose to treat with them as I will further show; but I propose to treat with them simply on the basis of a business but I propose to treat with them simply on the basis of a business proposition, and to treat with them because I believe they are in a condition to make a better trade with the Government, that is, to pay the Government more on their indebtedness than any other person or persons will or can do.

I have endeavored as a member of this committee to gain all the information that I could upon this subject. During the last session of this Congress I devoted all the time I could spare from other Congressional duties to the hearings before the committee and to reading all of the Government and other reports on the subject. I have reached the conclusion, as the result of my investigations, that this proposition is not only the proposition of the debtor railroad companies, but the proposition of the weaker of the two, and even a worse proposition than that which the Union Pacific Railroad Company had indicated, by the testimony of its attorney, Mr. Pierce, that it was willing and able to make when he first came before the committee. It is true that he afterwards withdrew it, and agreed that perhaps the Union Pacific could not do better than is proposed in this bill.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is an indisputable fact that in these two railroad companies there is a great difference in ability, so great that any reasonable man must admit that the Union Pacific is in better condition to pay, or in a condition to pay more on their indebtedness, than is the Central Pacific. If so, pray tell me why we should accord to it the same terms that we do to the Central Pacific, unless we are under some obligations to grant to this company some special privilege—some privilege not accorded even to its associate, the Central Pacific. That reason alone, Mr. Chairman, would influence me not to adopt the report of the majority of the committee.

Then, sir, upon what sort of testimony is the report based? Examine the report of the hearings before the committee during the past session and you will find that the testimony was in effect ex parte testimony, and that not under oath, but merely upon the statements of gentlemen who had come before the committee of their own accord. Your committee had no power, or at least exercised none, in sending for persons and papers. No witness was sworn. No one came before the committee except those who voluntarily appeared. The majority report is based upon a statement of the earnings and capacities of these companies, based upon the opinions of parties who are in the main friendly to this scheme. Is that the sort of evidence that the House of Representatives, treating this as a grave business proposition, are willing to act upon in disposing of a debt of $110,000,000 or $112,000,000? For one I can never consent, either as a member of the committee or as a member of this House, to make a settlement of a question of the magnitude of the one now before us upon such testimony.

Again, the distinguished chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Powers], on yesterday, in reply to the question whether or not the railroad companies could carry the question whether or not the railroad companies could carry into effect the pending bill, answered that they could. I have no doubt that they can. I have some doubt, however, whether or not they will, some time in the far future, be willing to do so. That they not only can do it, but are anxious to accept it is one reason why I am opposed to the bill. It is in effect their proposition.

It is, as I understand it, the proposition of the Central Pacific Railroad Company, the weaker, financially, of the two. I believe this company can carry it out, and feel assured that the Union Pacific Company can do so much more easily.

this company can carry it out, and feel assured that the Pacific Company can do so much more easily.

The distinguished gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Powers] said that his estimate was based on hard times. It looks to me as though it was not only based on hard times, but, if you believe what was so eloquently said by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Bell.] on the said of the said yesterday, that it was based on some very hard practices. Mr.
Bell showed you how they at least had the opportunity to reduce their net incomes so as to prevent the paying into the Government Treasury what might have been expected under the Thurman Act.

I ask the Committee of the Whole House, Are you willing to make a settlement based upon the figures of the distinguished gentleman from Vérmont, based, as he says, upon hard prices, and, as the gentleman from Texas has shown you, upon hard practices? I call the attention of the committee to the fact that when the attention of the gentleman from Vermont was called to this, he used this language, "that everyone must determine for him-self as to whether that would be a proper basis." Now, I ask the members of this committee, How many of you can determine for yourselves, by the facts and figures presented by the committee, what is the income of these railroad companies? Upon what basis can you make this settlement? Are you satisfied in your minds what are the earnings of these railroad companies? The distinguished chairman of the committee frankly tells you that you must determine this for yourselves.

Now, I insist and will further on attempt to show to you that we have no information before us upon which we can intelligently settle this question. I submit that the adoption of the report of the committee would be a losing business to the Government, even if it were carried out in good faith by the railroad companies and the 2 per carried out in good faith by the railroad companies. and the 2 per cent interest, as well as the entire principal, paid as provided for in the bill. As has been well said, if we extend this favor, ought we not to receive something for it? Are we under any special obligations to these companies or either of them? Certainly not. I have not time to go into it, but I believe this House will concur with me in answering that we are not. Is this extension of so large a debt worth anything? If so, ought not these companies to give us some additional security for the favor? I say they should, and that they are able to do so. They have pro-I say they should, and that they are able to do so. They have proposed to do better in the past. Should they not be required to do so now? I insist that they should be.

Under the proposed bill the Government will be no better protected than under the existing law. While an increase in the second mortgages are given over the subsidiary lines and the terminal facilities are included in the proposed bill, the increase in the first-mortgage debt, which this permits, will more than equal the security proposed to be given, and then, in my humble judgment, we will have no better security than we have at present. I respectfully submit, too, in this connection that according to the best evidence, according to the evidence that we have had before this committee, this debt is worth somewhere at least from $50,000,000 to $70,000,000; and it does occur to me that these railroad compa nies who owe it, having underlying securities, something which they wish to save, ought to and will do more, and give us a better proposition than this now presented by the majority report of the committee. I submit upon the evidence, upon the first proposition of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and upon the fact that two years ago both of these railroad companies were willing to accept the Reilly bill, that there is more in this controversy for the Government than it will receive under the pending bill. At least we have not satisfactory evidence to induce us as Representatives to make a settlement without further inquiry and more information.

I am not content simply to oppose this bill, but propose, after spending six months of investigation on the Committee on Pacific Railroads, to submit such suggestions as have occurred to me. My colleague, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Hubbard], who first spoke in opposition to this bill, as I understand him, proposes nothing. In fact, he said that he had no measure to propose, and was attempting to put no measure before Congress. While I agree in much that he said, I disagree with him in so far as his conclusions are concerned; yet he offers no remedy. Will it do to simply kill the bill? I think not, for as I said at the beginning, I think the time for action has arrived, and something ought to Some of these bonds have already matured, and many of them will soon mature.

What is the remedy? Must we simply kill the bill as offered without bringing in some remedy? If I understand the temper of this House, it is likely to do it. We at least have the precedent of the Fifty-third and Fifty-second Congresses for killing bills of this the Fitty-third and Fitty-second Congresses for Killing bills of this sort. Are we to neglect our duty by doing nothing? For if the time of action has arrived we should at least legislate on this subject. If we do not settle it, we should authorize some one to do it. My friend and colleague from Texas [Mr. Bell] has prepared an admirable substitute, which I frankly say if I believed the railroad companies could work up to I would cheerfully support. There is nothing in it that I object to, except that I believe it to be so stringent that the railroad companies could not comply with it. I think the railroad companies would be unable to live up to it, and thus practically there will be no legislation. I think that his bill leans too far against the railroad companies, while I think the bill of the majority leans too much toward their interests and does not properly protect the Government. Entertaining these views, I have submitted a substitute, which the committee will find in the RECORD of yesterday, page 578, which at the proper time I propose to offer, and which I think under all the circumstances the best that Congress can now do. This substitute provides for the circumstance of the congress can now do. vides for the appointment of a commission, consisting of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Attorney-General, with full power to settle the questions pending between the Government and these bond-aided railway companies. It also provides that any settlement they may agree upon shall be submitted in writing to the President of the United States, and that before it becomes binding it must have received his approval.

Now, why should Congress adopt such a plan? I say, first, because Congress has not and can not readily acquire the necessary information upon which to properly act; second, because both Houses of Congress will probably never agree upon a settlement; and in substantiation of that opinion I call attention to the fact that this question has already been before both the Fifty-second and the Fifty-third Congresses and failed. Many gentlemen here will at least remember the discussion in the Fifty-third Congress on the Reilly bill, which, it is conceded, was a much better measure for the Government than the bill which is now pending, but it was defeated, and as I understand, no bill for a settlement but it was defeated, and as I understand, no bill for a settlement of this question has as yet passed either House of Congress. Such a bill has not merely to run the gantlet here, but also in the Senate, and has to secure the approval of the President. Now, judging the future by the past, are we likely to enact any such measure? If not, what is to become of this indebtedness? This is no new theory, Mr. Chairman. In investigating this matter and trying to find out what remedy ought to be pursued, I have noted the fact that President Harrison, in his third annual message, sent to the Fifty-second Congress, referred to this subject, and I desire to read a short recommendation which he then made:

The report of the Commissioner of Railroads shows that the total debt of the subsidized railroads to the United States was on July 31, 1899, $112,512,613.06. A large part of this debt is now fast approaching maturity, and no adequate provision exists for its payment. Some policy for dealing with this debt with a view of its ultimate collection should be at once adopted. It is very difficult and well-nigh impossible for so large a body as the Congress to conduct the necessary negotiations and investigations. I therefore recommend that provision be made for the appointment of a commission to agree upon and report a plan for dealing with this debt.

Again, I find in the first report of the Commissioner of Railroads, General Hampton, a paragraph upon this subject embody-ing substantially the same recommendation, which also I will ing substantially the same recommendation, which also I will read:

In view of the magnitude of the interests involved and of the fact that the funding bill ($.751, Fifty-second Congress, first session), which was made the subject of a special report, and with sundry amendments recommended for adoption by my predecessor, does not meet with favor by certain officials of the Central Pacific Railroad Coupany, I would recommend the appointment by the President of a commission with full power to settle the indebtedness of the bond-aided Pacific railroads to the Government on terms which shall be honorable to the companies and just to the United States. The appointment of such a commission was urged by my predecessor and recommended by President Harrison, and in view of the many and complex questions involved in the final settlement of all differences between the Government and the subsidized roads, I regard it as of the utmost importance that such action should be taken. It would be difficult, if not impossible, for a satisfactory adjustment of all the grave questions which must necessarily be considered to be arrived at by so large a body as Congress, pressed as the members always are in the ordinary discharge of their public duties; nor is it probable that any agreement could be reached which would, while protecting the vast interests of the Government, be just and equitable to the railroad companies concerned. Some settlement must be made promptly, for a large portion of the indebtedness of the companies to the Government will mature in a short time, and as the companies are not in a condition to meet their Habilities, the only alternative which will be left to the Government will mature in a short time, and as the companies are not in a condition to meet their Habilities, the only alternative which will be left to the Government will be to assume ownership of the roads, or to accept such terms as may be proposed by the officials of the companies.

As the Government holds only a second mortgage on these roads, in

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I consumed? The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has occupied twenty-two minutes

Mr. HARRISON. I will ask the Chair to stop me at the end of thirty minutes, as I have promised to divide my time with other gentlemen. I have read to this committee the recommendation made by the Commissioner of Railroads in his first report. I find that in the last report of the same officer he renews the recommendation made by Mr. Chairman, have not these opinions of President Harrison and of the Railroad Commissioner, expressed three or four years ago, been fully justified by the inability of Congress to act upon this question up to this time? In my substitute I change the recommendation of the Commissioner of Railroads in this: He recommends the appointment of commissioners by the President, but, after consulting with other members and reflecting upon the subject, it is my opinion that we had better appoint certain officials of the Government to constitute this commission. My bill, therefore, names three heads of Departments as the members of the proposed commission. Are not the gentlemen now occupying those positions, and those who will likely succeed them, in every way qualified to render this service? Mark it, no action upon their part is to be binding until it is approved by the President of the United States.

My substitute relegates this matter to a commission composed of three Cabinet officers, and makes their action subject to the apof three Cabinet onicers, and makes their action subject to the approval of the President. Are they not as well equipped to act as this body or the Senate? I submit to you, as rational men, if you were dealing simply in an individual matter and undertaking a settlement with an insolvent debtor, could you not arrive at a better conclusion and reach a more satisfactory settlement by talking to him face to face? Under the provisions of this substitute the officers designated to act as this commission can send for witnesses, can administer oaths, can secure documentary evidence; and they can talk with the representatives of these railroad companies face to face. They need not accept the first proposition which the companies may make; they themselves may submit counter propositions. They can treat this whole question as business men. Are they not capable of doing so? I insist that they are.

Mr. COX. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the settlement which may be made by this proposed board or commission is to be final, or will it come back to Congress for approval?

Mr. HARRISON. If a settlement is made by the commission, it will be final. The bill proposes to give them full power.

Mr. COX. Final when approved by the Development.

Mr. HARRISON. It a settlement is all the superior of the full power, Mr. COX. Final when approved by the President?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir. My substitute proposes to go on further and provide what shall be done in case there should be a failure to reach any agreement. Let me read the provision of the substitute in regard to that matter:

SEC: 3. That said commission shall within sixty days after the assembling of the next regular session of Congress report their action to it, and, in case of their failure to settle said indebtedness or any part thereof at the time of making such report, to recommend such legislation as in their judgment may be necessary or proper to protect the interests of the Government and to enforce the prompt collection of any of said indebtedness that may then be due and unpaid.

The substitute, as I have said, proposes to give this commission full power to make, with the approval of the President, any settlement which they may deem right. Representing the Government and dealing with these railroad companies face to face, they will, as I have already suggested, have better facilities for reaching a settlement than we have. It seems to me the only question is, whether Congress is willing to intrust the settlement of such a greation to a commission such as the substitute provides for. a question to a commission such as the substitute provides for, whose action, subject to the approval of the President, is to be final.

Mr. HERMANN. Is there any limitation whatever prescribed in this substitute as to the settlement which this commission shall be empowered to make? In other words, will it be within the power of the commission to remit entirely the indebtedness of these companies to the Government?

Mr. HARRISON. The substitute proposes to give them full power.

Mr. HERMANN. Absolute power?
Mr. HARRISON. Yes; absolute power. Whatever settlement they may reach, subject to the approval of the President, is to be

A MEMBER. Sixty or seventy million dollars.

Mr. HARRISON. I believe, Mr. Chairman, the thirty minutes to which I limited myself have expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two minutes remaining. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two minutes remaining.
Mr. HARRISON. Then, in conclusion, let me ask you to consider this proposition fairly and carefully. I desire to urge upon the members of the House the necessity of some action. I ask you gentlemen if you have any reasonable belief that we shall pass this funding bill or any other funding bill? I ask you whether you will be discharging your duty to the great American people if you let this Congress expire without taking action on this question—a question involving $110,000,000 or $112,000,000? Ought not something to be done? If we will not pass this substitute, then let us pass the Attorney-General's bill or some other measure. Whatever may be our differences, we should enact some legislation on this subject. Let us perfect some bill and protect the interests of the Government.

I regret that the time allowed for the consideration and discussion of this matter is so short. I trust that members of the House will give it proper consideration and will recognize the fact, so ably urged by the chairman of the committee, that the time for action has arrived. For one, while wedded to no theory, I submit that so far as the House of Representatives is concerned, we should place ourselves upon record as having legislated in some way upon this important subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Inityminutes of the gentleman's time nave now expired.

Mr. HARRISON. I will now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCall].

A Member. Mr. McCall is not now in the House.

Mr. HARRISON. Then I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Boatner].

Mr. Boatner. Mr. Chairman, it is a matter of profound regret to me that the consideration and discussion of probably the most important business matter with which this House will be called moon to deal should be participated in by so small a portion called upon to deal should be participated in by so small a portion of the membership of the body, and were I not impelled by a sense of duty to do so, I should not trouble the House with any

Sir, the gentlemen who have spoken in behalf of the bill have not only confined their remarks to a single aspect of the question, but have resented all efforts to call attention to manifest objections to it by curtly declining to yield to any interruptions. Such a course can have no effect, because the freedom of debate in the Committee of the Whole renders it easy to bring out all objections, and I do not doubt but that the opponents of the measure will avail themselves of the opportunity.

This House, Mr. Chairman, is asked to accept the settlement proposed by the railroad companies, because this bill is substantially their offer of settlement, on the ground that the Government is powerless, and that we ought to take the best the companies will give us.

It is argued, sir, that our lien and mortgage affects only broken and disjointed portions of the lines, that the terminals and very valuable parts of the systems are free of the Government lien, and that with respect to the unsubsidized portions of the property the Government has no rights and can enforce no remedies. We are told that if we reject the proposition submitted to us,

We are told that if we reject the proposition submitted to us, the first mortgage will be immediately foreclosed, and we will be compelled either to advance money enough to pay all the companies' debts which have priority over those due the United States, which amount to many millions of dollars, or see the roads sell for the first mortgages, resulting in a total loss of the debt due the United States, amounting to over $100,000,000.

We are told, sir, that it is simply a question of business, whether we will accept what we can get for a second mortgage on property the prior lien on which is about equal to its value; in fine, we have heard all the disadvantages of our position so movingly depicted that one unacquainted with the subject would suppose that we would do well to get rid of the claim upon any terms at all that released us from liability to the railroads for damages for breach of contract. breach of contract.

Mr. Chairman, I agree most heartily with the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Powers] that the question at issue is one of business and of vital importance; but there is also involved a question of morals not second in importance to the money which it is claimed we are about to lose, which the gentlemen who have framed the bill and who support it appear to have entirely over-

If, however, sir, we look at it from a purely business standpoint— if we ignore the moral question to which I will refer later—we ought at least to give the Government the benefit of all the means of recovery which are available. The majority of the Committee on Pacific Railroads have proceeded on the assumption, first, that the Government's lien and mortgage rest upon portions of the lines only, the Omaha bridge and valuable terminals being excluded; that these fragments upon which the lien rests are of little value comparatively, and can be paralleled at less cost than the mortgages which take priority over the Government; and, second, that the Government has no recourse against the officers and directors of these companies to make them account for the money and property unlawfully converted to their own use and against the stockholders for the payment of their subscriptions to the capital stock unlawfully issued to them without money and without price.

We, the representatives of the United States and guardians of

We, the representatives of the United States and guardians of the people's interests, are complacently asked to ignore a plain and unambiguous statute, which declares that the United States has a lien and mortgage upon the entire line and on the property of every kind, nature, and description of these roads to secure the payment of all sums due by them to the United States, because the Supreme Court decided before the passage of the law that our lien upon the income of these roads extended to only part of the lines, and are also asked to ignore the existence of a perfectly lawful and valid claim of these companies against their officers. lawful and valid claim of these companies against their officers, directors, and some of their stockholders for an amount sufficient, or nearly so, to pay the debt due the United States, and which can be made available by the United States.

In the case of The United States vs. Kansas Pacific Railroad Company, reported in 99 United States, page 445, et seq., it was held that the mortgage and lien retained, or rather attempted to be retained, by the acts of 1862 and 1864, incorporating the Pacific Railroad companies, did not extend to certain portions of the roads, which in the view of the court were unsubsidized.

Under the provisions of those acts the companies availing themselves thereof were entitled to receive bonds of the United States, in sums of $1,000 each, at the rate of sixteen—and in some cases thirty-two—thousand dollars per mile, bearing 6 per cent per annum interest, and payable thirty years after date, the bonds to be issued to the companies on the completion and acceptance by the officers of the Government of the road in sections of 20 miles; and to secure the payment of principal and interest it was declared in the act that "the issue of said bonds and delivery to the company shall ipso facto constitute a first mortgage on the whole line of the snail ipso facto constitute a first mortgage on the whole line of the railroad and telegraph, with the rolling stock, fixtures, and property of every kind and description, and in consideration of which said bonds may be issued." It is perfectly apparent to my mind that the obligation of the companies to pay the bonds at maturity in principal and interest and the mortgage of its whole line and all its property of every kind and description was the consideration of the issue of the kends referred to in the law and that the tion of the issue of the bonds referred to in the law, and that the construction given this section by the Supreme Court would confine the mortgage of the United States to the particular miles of the roads against which bonds were issued. The construction placed upon it by the court seems to be at war with the plain and unambiguous language of the law, which reserved, or attempted to reserve, a mortgage on the whole line, but, "as the law awards it and the court doth give it," we must needs accept the decision of the court as final, and as the authoritative construction of this

But, Mr. Chairman, Congress, in anticipation that such a decision might be rendered, the case cited being then pending and this contention being made by the railroad companies, sought to set the question at rest by the enactment of what is commonly known as the Thurman Act, which is so plain that misconstruction is impossible.

Section 9 of that act provides as follows:

Section 9 of that act provides as follows:

SEC. 9. That all sums due to the United States from any of said companies, respectively, whether payable presently or not, and all sums required to be paid to the United States or into the Treasury, or into said sinking fund under this act or under the acts hereinbefore referred to, or otherwise, are hereby declared to be a lien upon all the property, estate, rights, and franchises of every description granted or conveyed by the United States to any of said companies, respectively or jointly, and also upon all the estate and property, real, personal, and mixed, assets, and income of the said several railroad companies, respectively, from whatever source derived, subject to any lawfully prior and paramount mortgage, lien, or claim thereon. But this section shall not be construed to prevent said companies, respectively, from using and disposing of any of their property or assets in the ordinary, proper, and lawful course of their current business, in good faith and for valuable consideration.

Now. Mr. Chairman, if that act is not void, it is conclusive of Now, Mr. Chairman, if that act is not void, it is conclusive of the question under discussion.

If void, for what reason?

It violates none of the limitations of Congressional power contained in the Constitution. It impairs the obligation of no contract. It divests no vested right. It takes no property without due process of law. It is not expost facto nor retroactive in its How, then, is it void? And why does it not create a mortgage and lien in favor of the Government, to date from its enactment? The act of which it is a part was framed by the late Senator Thurman, of Ohio, it was understood, with the assistance of Senator Edmunds, of Vermont; certainly very high legal authority to draw or propose a void and unconstitutional statute.

It was elaborately construed by the Supreme Court in the sinking fund case, reported in 99 United States, 700, and the clause under consideration by the court in that case found constitutional.

The provision of the law assisted by the Central Pacific Reil

The provision of the law assailed by the Central Pacific Railroad Company was the section of the act which amended the act of 1864 by providing that all instead of one-half of the compensation for services rendered for the Government by said companies should be required to be applied to the payment of the bonds issued by the Government in aid of the construction of said roads.

Sections 2 and 3 of the act of 1878 provided that the whole amount of compensation which may from time to time be due amount of compensation which may from time to time be due to said several railroad companies for services rendered for the Government shall be retained by the United States; one-half thereof to be applied at once to the liquidation of the interest which the United States had paid on the subsidy bonds issued in aid of the roads, and the other half turned into a sinking fund, and to be annually invested by the Secretary of the Treasury in bonds of the United States, and to be applied at the maturity of the debt due the United States to its payment and to the payment of the first-mortgage bonds upon the roads.

This amendment of the law, Mr. Chairman, was vigorously attacked as void, because it changed the terms of the contract between the United States and the railway companies without their consent; because it compelled them to pay a large part of their debt before it was due; because it increased the security of the Government for its debt, by impounding a part of the revenues of the roads upon which it had no lien, and that for all these reasons it deprived them of their property without due process of law.

Mr. Justice Field, Mr. Justice Bradley, and Mr. Justice Strong maintained these views in opinions of great strength, but the majority of the court, through Chief Justice Waite, held otherwise.

This corporation

Says the court-

sa creation of the United States. It is a private corporation created for public purposes, and its property is to a large extent devoted to public uses. It is therefore subject to legislative control so far as its business affects the public interests. * * * Giving full effect to the principles which have been thus authoritatively stated, we think it safe to say that whatever rules Congress might have prescribed in the original charter for the government of the corporation in the administration of its affairs it retained the power to establish by amendment. In doing so it can not undo what has already been done, and can not unmake contracts that have already been made; but it may provide for what shall be done in the future, and may direct what preparation shall be made for the due performance of contracts already entered into.

In other words, Congress, having found that the provisions in the act of 1864 for the payment of the principal and interest of the subsidy bonds were wholly inadequate, was authorized to make adequate provision therefor by withholding payment of all that the Government might owe for transportation from time to time, and by requiring the companies to pay 25 instead of 5 per cent of their annual net earnings.

These changes in the contract were sustained on the ground that Congress might direct the preparations to be made for the due performance of the contract already entered into with the United States.

Section 9 of the act, Mr. Chairman, constituted no material change, and was manifestly designed for the same purpose. Congress, it is to be supposed, realized the necessity of securing the entire amount of the Government indebtedness by a lien upon the entire line of the road. The omission in the act of 1862, or, rather, the construction which the court had placed upon that act, rendered it absolutely necessary that an amendment of the law should be had in order to secure a lien in behalf of the Government on the unsubsidized portion of the line and terminals which the companies had acquired. In my judgment, the objections to the provisions of the statute which took all instead of onehalf of the compensation due by the Government to the roads, and 25 instead of 5 per cent of the net earnings, constituted more radical and important changes of the contract—one more subversive of the rights of the parties—than the creation of the lien, which interfered with no rights, impaired no obligations, did not even embarrass the companies in the use of their property, and was only a conservative measure taken for the security of the rights of the Government.

I do not agree, however, Mr. Chairman, that the existence or nonexistence of a Government lien on the unsubsidized portions of the line is a matter of the vital importance which the supporters of the bill seem to attach to it. It is, of course, if it exists, second to all other liens which existed upon these properties at the time of the enactment of the statute of 1878, and would be useful only in foreclosure proceedings. The absence of the lien, however, would not seriously interfere with foreclosure proceedings if the United States should see fit to institute them. Whether was the dakt due the Government is secured by a lien upon the or not the debt due the Government is secured by a lien upon the unsubsidized portion of the roads, the debt, undeniably, is one due by the companies, and even as an ordinary and unsecured claim, could be used to force a sale of the company's property. In fact, it not infrequently occurs that the unsecured and floating debts of corporations are the basis of proceedings by which their affairs are placed in the hands of receivers, and liquidated under the

It is argued that the decision of the court in United States vs. Central Pacific Railway Company (118 U.S.) is conclusive upon

I do not find, Mr. Chairman, that the question of liens was at all involved. In that case the Treasury officials withheld the compensation for transportation rendered the United States by the Central Pacific Company over 2,175 miles of its railroad which had been constructed without the aid of the United States. The contention of the United States was that they were justified in withholding the compensation due by virtue of the provisions of section 2 of the act of May 7, 1878, commonly known as the Thurman Act, and the court said that the contention was not well founded. The the court said that the contention was not well founded. The court held that section 2 of the act of 1878 only authorized the retention of compensation due for transportation on the roads to which had been issued the bonds of the United States to aid in their construction, and did not apply to branch and leased roads which belonged to the Central Pacific Company or to those portions of the line in aid of which no bonds had been issued. In fact, the decision here is a mere reiteration of the conicon rendered tions of the line in aid of which ho bonds had been issued. In fact, the decision here is a mere reiteration of the opinion rendered in the case of the United States vs. The Kansas Pacific (99 U. S., page 455), and does not at all bear upon the question of liens. Contra to the position maintained by the supporters of the bill, the Supreme Court said in the case of the Union Pacific Railroad Company vs. The United States (99 U. S., page 424):

It may perhaps be urged that the first-mortgage bondholders have no lien on the net earnings, but it has the same lien that the Government has. Both liens are coextensive with the whole property of the company, so far, at least, as relates to the railroad and telegraph lines and their equipment, and all property appurtenant thereto.

It may be, Mr. Chairman, that the Supreme Court will hold, as maintained by the supporters of the bill, that section 9 of the act of 1878 is void, but to do so they must reverse the principle announced by them in the Sinking Fund case, and must hold that Congress was without the power, after having made the contract embraced in the acts of 1862 and 1864, to change or alter the same without the consent of the railway companies.

Mr. Chairman, the friends of the bill display a great deal of impatience at the discussion of the frauds which were perpetrated in the construction of these roads. They seem to think that no good can be accomplished by their recital, and that it serves only to prevent a reasonable and businesslike settlement of the questions at issue between the United States and the Pacific Railway companies. If I agreed with their conclusions that both the Government and the railway companies are remediless to recover from panies. If I agreed with their conclusions that both the Government and the railway companies are remediless to recover from their officers and stockholders the value of stock not paid for and profits unlawfully obtained by their officers in contracts with themselves, I would agree that no useful purpose could be subserved by exposing to public view the colossal frauds committed many years ago, and which amount to a national scandal.

But, sir, in my judgment, the obligation of the great capitalists and the great estates which are the outgrowth of these frauds to account to the Union Pacific, the Central Pacific—in fact, all the roads in which they occurred—is an asset of these companies of very great value, and, in my opinion, it is a duty of the House of Representatives not only to use all legal means to force the recovery of the sums from the money standpoint, but because it is contrary to good morals and public policy that we should appear to give our indorsement to such malversation of corporate funds and abuse of the confidence reposed by the Government and people of the United States.

By an act approved March 3, 1873 (17 Statutes at Large, page 509), the Attorney-General was directed "to institute a suit in equity in the name of the United States against the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and against all persons who may in their own names or through any agents have subscribed for or received capital stock in said railroad, but which stock had not been paid for in full in money, or who may have received as dividends or otherwise portions of the capital stock of said road, or the proceeds or values thereof, or other property of said road, unlawfully and contrary to equity, or who may have received as profits or proceeds for construction or equipment of said road, ceeds for construction or equipment of said road, or other contracts therewith, moneys or other property which ought in equity to belong to said railroad corporations, or who may under pretense of having complied with the acts to which this is an addition, have wrongfully and unlawfully received from the United States bonds, moneys, or lands which ought in equity to be accounted for and paid to said railroad company or to the United States and to company or to the United States, and to compel payment for said stock and the collection and payment of said moneys and the restoration of said property or its value either to the said railroad corporation or to the United States, whichever shall in equity be held entitled

The revelations and disclosures made by the Wilson committee of that year were the direct cause of the enactment of this statute, which was placed as an amendment on one of the appropriation which was placed as an amendment on one of the appropriation bills, and, in my opinion, Mr. Chairman, is the reason why no Congress since that time has ever been willing to pass a funding bill. Nor do I believe, sir, that any Congress will be found consenting to a funding bill until the charges contained in the report of the Wilson committee and in the report of the commissioners appointed by the President in 1887 are disproved, or the liability of the colossal embezzlers of public money is determined by law. The Attorney-General instituted the suit in accordance with the directions of Congress, and reiterated substantially the charges made in the Wilson report. He charged substantially that the stock of the company had been fraudulently issued without payment either in money or property; that the officers of the Union Pacific had made contracts with Hoxie, Ames, and Davis, each one of these parties being a mere trustee for the officers and directors, all of whom were interested in the contract; that they directors, all of whom were interested in the contract; that they virtually paid to themselves excessive prices for construction and all services rendered to the company. In other words, that they prostituted their offices as officers and directors of the company to plunder it and to unlawfully appropriate to themselves everything of value which the company possessed. The suit was against the company, the officers who had betrayed their trusts, and the stockholders who had failed to pay for their stock. None denied the charges, but all united in demurring to the bill. The Supreme Court sustained the demurrers as to the Government, because it held that the Government had no interest to be subserved by the suit, nor could any decree be rendered in which the Government would have such an interest as to entitle it to stand in judgment. The court found that the railroad companies were complying with their contracts to the Government. There was no allegation in the bill to the contrary. Under the terms of the contract—to wit, the acts of 1862 and 1864—the companies were contract—to wit, the acts of 1862 and 1864—the companies were only bound to pay 5 per cent of their net earnings to go into a sinking fund, and to leave in the hands of the Treasury one-half the compensation which should be found due to them for transportation of mails, troops, etc. The court was of opinion that Congress, having made these provisions for the protection of its rights, had no interest in the management of the company until by a default of the company action for the protection of the Government's interest should become necessary; that the Government had retained no visitorial power over the companies; that it was not in any manner bound, nor did it have the right, to protect the rights and interests of stockholders of the corporations, these people being able to protect themselves. The bill was therefore discussed. In discussion the kill the court caves. fore dismissed. In dismissing the bill, the court says fore dismissed. In dismissing the bill, the court says:

The substance of the charge is that the board of directors of the railroad company made contracts for building the road, and for running the Pullman cars on it, and for mining its coal lands and purchasing the coal so mined, which were a fraud upon the company; that these contracts allowed exorbitant prices for work done and material furnished; that otherwise they were very advantageous to the other contracting parties and injurious to the company; that in all of them the directors, or a controlling majority of them, were interested adversely to the company; that, in fact, they were, in the name of the company, making contracts with themselves as the other party. In short, it may be taken for granted that if these allegations are true, as they must be held to be on demurrer, frauds more unmitigated than those set forth in this bill were never perpetrated on a helpless corporation by its managing directors.

That these frauds are such as a court of equity would relieve against in a proper case may be seen in the opinion of the circuit court for the Nebraska district, in a suit growing out of the Wyoming Coal Company's contract. (Wardell vs. The Union Pacific Railroad Company, 4 Dill., 330.)

The first inquiry arising on these facts is, What relief can be given, and who is entitled to it?

The obvious reply to the first branch of the question is, that the parties who made this contract and received the pecuniary benefit of it can at law be made responsible in damages or held in equity to compensation for the loss suffered. There would be no difficulty in adjudging in a proper suit that such contracts (i.e., the contracts made by the directors of the Union Pacific with the Crédit Mobilier, which was another name for themselves, and the directors of the Central Pacific with the Contract and Finance Company, another name for themselves) were void, and then ordering an accounting on the basis of a fair compensation for what had been done in the way of construction, building, opening mines, furnishing coal, etc., and what had been received for such work and materials. The difficulty is, to whom shall this money be paid when recovered, and can it be recovered in this suit! If the railroad company, falling into purer hands, had brought such a suit, the bill might be sustained.

But the company is not the complainant here. It seeks no relief for these wrongs, etc.

No reasonably well-informed lawyer will deny that an action lay in behalf of the Union Pacific Railway Company, in fact, in behalf of all of them, against any stockholder who had obtained stock without compensation to the company. The law positively forbade the issuance of stock except for money, and no one who obtained it in violation of the law could evade the demand of the company for payment for it if made by its proper officers.

Likewise, Mr. Chairman, I apprehend that no lawyer will dispute the proposition that the contracts made by the officers of those companies with themselves under another name were void, and that whatever construction and work was done by them nominally as contractors would be held to have been done by them in their capacity as officers of the company, and while they would be entitled to receive credit for the actual cost of the work, would be entitled to receive credit for the actual cost of the work, they would be held to account for all that they had received from the company in excess of such cost. This is plainly and explicitly decided in the case that I have referred to (98 U. S., page 610).

I find, sir, according to the report of the Pacific Railroad Commissioners, that out of an issue of $54,000,000 of the capital stock of the Central Pacific Railway Company, $760,000 only was paid for. Out of an issue of $36,824,000 by the Union Pacific, only $400,650 was paid for, leaving an amount due to these two companies on stock account only of $89,773,000.

It is useless to go into the details of the other frauds. They are gigantic; and if the Union and Pacific railroad companies could to-day recover from the managing directors and officers who had charge of their affairs when they were in process of construction, who received and sold the subsidy bonds of the United States, who issued and sold their first-mortgage bonds, who embezzled who issued and sold their first-mortgage bonds, who embezzled the proceeds of the magnificent land grant, these roads would be able to pay off their entire indebtedness to the United States, and would have a handsome surplus in their respective treasuries.

The gentlemen, however, who advocate the passage of this bill sneer at the idea that anything can be recovered, and claim that if no other obstacle stood in the way the statute of limitations would bar all the actions. I confess I know of no statute under which they would be barred. Fortunately for the United States, a suit was brought by the Attorney-General against Mrs. Stanford, the widow of Leland Stanford, to make the estate of her deceased husband liable for a certain proportion of the debt due to the United States by the Central Pacific Railway Company, under the provisions of a statute of the State of California, which renders the stockholders of corporations personally liable for their debts in proportion to their holdings of stock, and Leland Stanford having been a large holder of stock of the Central Pacific, the effort was made by the Government to hold his estate liable for his proportion of the debt due by the company to the United States. The Supreme Court of the United States maintained a demurrer to the bill, and held in substance that the rights of the United States and the obligations of the stockholders of the Central Pacific to the United States were to be decided entirely by the tral Pacific to the United States were to be decided entirely by the acts of Congress incorporating that company, authorizing the construction of the road, issuing of bonds, etc. This decision has been referred to in this debate as settling adversely the right of the United States to proceed against the officers, directors, and stockholders of these roads. In my opinion, it is just the contrary. It deprives these parties of the benefit of the statutes of limitations of the several States. It eliminates the questions of State law and hinges the whole case on the construction of the statutes of the United States to which I have referred.

The Supreme Court said in 1878 that the United States could not proceed against the stockholders and officers of the Union Pacific because at that time its right of action had not arisen. The bonds issued in aid of the road were not due either in principal or interest. The companies had not defaulted on any of their obligations, and non constat but that the Union Pacific would be prepared at the maturity of the obligations to meet them. Their maturity has now been reached, and the court which said in 1878 that the United States could not sue until 1897 can hardly say when suit is filed in 1897 that it is barred by the statute of limitations. It is an elementary principle of the civil law as old as the Pandects of Justinian that prescription (at common law of the statute of limitations) does not run against those who are unable to act, and the application of the maxim, which is founded in reason and justice, as well as law, to the facts in this case would certainly operate as a suspension of the statute of limitations during the period that the Supreme Court had tied the hands of the officers of the Government by declaring that their right of action had not arisen. The very contingency which was anticipated by Congress when it directed the suit to be brought against the actors only the Credit Mobilier scandal has arisen. The officers of that company looted its treasury and have rendered it unable to comply with its obligations to the Government. By thirty years of intentional mismanagement, peculation, and fraud; by thirty years of resistance to the acts of Congress intended to secure a compliance with the company's obligations to the United States, they have reduced its states. its stock to a merely nominal value; they have mortgaged every available piece of property which it possesses; they have appropriated to themselves all the resources and means of the company which could be abstracted, and present it to-day, at the maturity of its obligations to the Government, a financial wreck, seeking an extension of eighty-five years on its debt to the United States as a result of the peculation and fraud to which its affairs have been subjected.

I confess, Mr. Chairman, that I see no legal difficulty in the way of exercising the remedies of the United States against the property of this road, and the others also, and of thus proceeding by a suit in the nature of a creditor's bill against the stockholders who have not paid for the stock that was issued to them, and against the officers who have violated their trusts, for the recovery of whatever amounts they may owe to their respective companies. But this course would be attended with the danger of the Government's being compelled either to buy in the roads and pay the ernment's being compelled either to buy in the roads and pay the prior mortgages and liens or to let them go for the first mortgages and trust to the proceedings against the stockholders and directors for the recovery of the amount due the United States. This course, I apprehend, will not be pursued, and as there is a better and more practical one, I am surprised that the committee, in the absence of a better proposition from these companies, has not introduced a bill which would enable the officers of the Government to assert our rights by this means.

Under section 11 of the act of 1878 it is provided that—

If either of said railroad companies shall fail to perform all and singular the

If either of said railroad companies shall fail to perform all and singular the requirements of this act, and the acts hereinbefore mentioned, or of any other act relating to said act to be by it performed, for the period of six months next after such performance may be due, such failure shall operate as a forfeiture of all the rights, privileges, grants, and franchises derived or obtained by it from the United States, and it would be the duty of the Attorney-General to cause such forfeiture to be judicially enforced.

It would be easy to amend this provision of the act by providing for the appointment of receivers or liquidators, in whom should be vested the entire powers of the corporations for the purposes of liquidation and settlement, and to authorize and require those liquidators to institute all such suits as the company itself could have instituted against its stockholders for payment of the stock issued to them, and against the officers and directors for the frauds and peculations committed by them.

Pending these suits, and until the ascertainment of their result, the railroads might be operated as they have been operated for several years past—by receivers—under the control and direction of the court. If at the end of these proceedings it should be ascertained that the facts stated by the Wilson committee, and reiterated by the commissioners of the Pacific Railroads, are untrue in point of fact; or if it shall be found that the stockholders who fraudulently received millions of dollars of the stock of these companies, with which ceived millions of dollars of the stock of these companies, with which they have since controlled it, to the wrong and injury of the United States, are beyond the reach of legal processes; or if it be established that the Credit Mobilier was a lawful corporation and lawfully conducted its business with the Union Pacific; if it be found that the Contract and Finance Company of California was likewise a lawful corporation, and that the directors and officers of the Central Pacific did not use it as a disguise to plunder that company, and in doing so, its bona fide stockholders and creditors, then we will be in a position to decently accept the best settlement which the financial condition of the companies would admit of. But until we have instituted these remedies we will, if we accept the settlement proposed, or any other funding bill, condone and the settlement proposed, or any other funding bill, condone and give our approval to the frauds to which I have referred.

But, sir, the gentlemen in charge of the bill maintain that the actions against the stockholders and officers of the companies can be maintained, notwithstanding the acceptance of the settlement proposed by the railway companies, and refer to a section of the bill under consideration which substantially reserves them.

I am astonished, Mr. Chairman, that any well-informed lawyer will maintain for a moment that such a reservation is possible. The moment the United States accepts the settlement that the companies propose its rights for the time being are discharged. It will occupy exactly the same position which it occupied in 1873, when the suit which I have cited was brought by the Attorney-General, and when the Supreme Court said it had no right of action because the obligations of the company to it were not due.

It would be an absolute discharge of all collateral obligations. Let no man deceive himself on that subject.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Is not that the very purpose for which the owners of the Southern Pacific Railway are trying to get this bill through? They are the responsible men.

Mr. BOATNER. It appears to me, Mr. Chairman, that that is true. It has always been the motive at the bottom of this legislation. The owners of the accumulated and colossal fortunes which grew out of these peculations are more interested in being relieved from their obligation to the Government of the United States than they are in attling the wights of the United States as States than they are in settling the rights of the United States as against these companies. But two difficulties would present themselves in pursuing this course—one, the statute of limitations; the other, the difficulty at this length of time in procuring the evidence necessary to sustain the actions. Since the decision of the Supreme Court in the Stanford case, I apprehend that there will be no serious difficulty with the statute of limitations. If the stockholder sued for the value of the stock issued to him plead the statute of California or New York in bar of the action, the decision in the Stanford case would be a full reply. The stock was issued under the act of Congress. The act of Congress provided that he should pay for it. The act of Congress provides no statute of limitations for the action. Nor do the statutes of the United States establish any time as a bar to any action resting in the enforcement of its provisions.

If, however, Mr, Chairman, the House is determined to effect a settlement of this question upon purely a business basis, as my friend from Vermont puts it; if it is a matter of no consequence how the officers and directors of corporations created by the United States for a great and beneficent purpose have betrayed their trust, and we are to deal with them as honest debtors, reduced by misfortune to a condition of bankruptcy, then, sir, we should adopt the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Har-RISON] and commit the settlement into the hands of a commission who will deal with it to the best advantage of the United States. It is impossible for so large a body as the House of Representatives, or even the Committee on Pacific Railroads, to deal with this question with the accuracy and judgment with which it could be handled by a smaller commission. They could negotiate, not only with the companies, but with other companies who might desire to obtain control of the property. They might sell the Government lien, foreclose, or take such action as would seem for the best interests of the Government, after ascertaining by negotiation the very best arrangement that could be made, and while I am opposed to the bill under discussion or to any funding bill at present, if we are to make a settlement on the lines proposed by the committee I shall vote to place it in the hands of the commission proposed by the substitute offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON].

[Mr. SWANSON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. HARRISON. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCall].

Mr. McCall of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat reluctant to say anything about this measure in the time of those who are opposing its passage, but there is one matter which I have discovered in my limited investigation of the subject which I think should be brought clearly to the attention of the House. I find that the report of the committee and the report of previous committees in Congress—the Reilly report and the report of the minority of that committee—have proceeded upon the assumption that the Government has no lien upon the bridge and Omaha ter-minals of the Union Pacific Railroad. The gentleman from Ver-mont [Mr. Powers], the chairman of this committee, is not apt to overlook any proposition of law; but he seems to have been misled by the uniform tenor of the reports on this subject.

The Kansas Pacific case has been referred to repeatedly in this debate. That case covers some five pages in the report of the United States Supreme Court. Nearly four pages are taken up by a statement of the case and collateral matters which are not important, while one page of the report apparently disposes of this great question which involves many millions of the money of the

It would appear to an ordinary lawyer, casually examining the question, that the court could not have had in view in its decision any such momentous consequences as the decision is regarded as involving. But I find upon investigating the matter that that decision was not the only one made by the court at that time. There were four other Pacific railroad cases which were argued substantially at the same time and were decided upon the same day, involving precisely the same question; and the opinion in every one of these cases was rendered by the same justice.

The Kansas Pacific case sustains apparently the proposition made by the gentleman from Vermont, that the Government has no lien upon such portions of the road as are not shown by affidavits to have been built with the aid of the subsidy bonds. The court says, in the Kansas Pacific case:

From a careful examination of the statutes relating to this subject we are of opinion * * * that the subsidy bonds granted to the company, being granted only in respect of the original road, terminating at the one hundredth meridian, are a lien on that portion only, and that the 5 per cent of the net earnings is only demandable on the net earnings of said portion.

The question at issue in all these suits was upon what portions of these various lines the Government could claim 5 per cent of the net earnings. In, I think, three cases the Government was the plaintiff, attempting to recover its 5 per cent; in the other two cases it was the defendant, being sued for the cost of transporting the mails; but it put in as a set-off its claim of 5 per cent upon the net earnings, so that in all the cases the issue was precisely identical. The question was upon what portions of the road could the Government claim 5 per cent of the earnings; and the court held that it could only claim its 5 per cent of earnings upon those portions of the road on which it had a lien.

refer.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Ninety-nine United States Reports, page 458, in which the court took the position that the Government's right to its net earnings was practically coextensive with its lien; that the one is as long and as broad as the other.

Now, in turning to the first case decided on that day, which is the principal case on this subject, I find that the court passes upon the claim of the Government against the very railroad here in question—the Union Pacific Railroad Company. It endeavors in the first place to ascertain what are the net earnings to which the Government is entitled. It says:

In the first place they are the "net earnings of the road;" that is, the net earnings of the road as a railroad, including the telegraph. These earnings, however, must be regarded as embracing all the earnings and income derived by the company from the railroad proper, and all the appendages and appurtenances thereof, including its ferry and bridge at Omaha, its cars, and all its property and apparatus legitimately connected with its railroad.

So, Mr. Chairman, we have here a positive decision by the court upon the very matter at issue that the Government had a lien on upon the very matter at issue that the Government had a hen on the earnings, and consequently it follows from the doctrine in the Kansas Pacific case, to which I have referred, that the lien of the Government extended over the bridge and ferry as well.

The same question was considered and the same decision was reached by the court in a prior case—I think the case against Hall, which I do not happen to have at hand. President Lincoln fixed the eastern terminus of the road, and did not in the order mention the State of Lowe although it was clearly described. When tion the State of Iowa, although it was clearly described. it was afterwards brought in question, he wrote a letter explaining the original order, in which he said that he had intended to fix the eastern terminus in the State of Iowa, opposite "a place called Omaha," a city that has become very much more famous now than it was then, or the President would not have alluded to it in that indefinite manner. Now, of course, if the Government has no lien on the terminals at Omaha its security is not worth near as much as it otherwise would be.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. POWERS. The gentleman refers to the case reported in 99 United States Reports?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. POWERS (continuing). In which the court held that for the purpose of determining the net earnings of the whole Union Pacific system the principle there laid down would be followed.
But they held, to all intents and purposes, that the lien of the Government only extended to the portion of the road that had received aid.

I refer the gentleman, however, to 118 United States Supreme Court Reports, where this question came up and where the deci-sion was rendered, referring to the former case. If the gentleman will listen to me for a moment, I will read the exact text of the decision. I refer now to the case of United States vs. The Central Pacific Railway Company, in which the court say:

In the case of United States vs. Denver Pacific Railway Company (99 U. S., 460), decided at the same term, and in which the judgment was delivered by the same justice, it was held that the United States had no right, under the sixth section of the act of 1862, to retain compensation for services rendered upon a road the construction of which it had not aided by its bonds. The ground upon which the court placed its decision was that the Government had no lien except upon a road which it had so aided, and could retain neither the 5 per cent of the earnings of a road to which it had issued no bonds, nor compensation for transportation services thereon.

Now, this case in 118 Reports rose under this very section of the Thurman Act which the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Boat-NER] contended to-day changed the law on that subject. The court go on to say:

This court having thus interpreted the act of July 1, 1862, we can not, consistently with the established rules of construction, give a different meaning to substantially the same words in the act of May 7, 1878. (Reiche vs. Smythe, 13 Wall., 162.) In the act of July 1, 1862, the provision is, that "all compensation for services rendered for the Government shall be applied to the payment of said bonds." In the act of May 7, 1878, the words are, that "the whole amount of compensation * * * for services rendered for the Government shall be retained by the United States," one half to pay interest and the other half to be turned into the sinking fund. If the two acts are to be construed together and as one act, we must give the same meaning to like expressions in both. We can not say in one case that the compensation mentioned means compensation only for services on aided roads, and in the other that it includes compensation for services on roads not aided.

So I reiterate the statement which I made on yesterday that the Supreme Court has decided that the lien of the Government only extended to that portion of the road that received the subsidy

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I am very grateful, Mr. Chair-

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Massachusetts five minutes on account of the time that I occupied which properly belonged to him.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Vermont for the interruption as well as for the time that he has extended to me. I am obliged to the gentleman for reading from such an authority as the Supreme Court of the United States, but I do not see that what he has read, with all due deference to him, affects the decision I have already cited. It is distinctly decided in the case to which I called the attention of the committee that the Government lien does extend to the earnings of the ferry and the bridge at Omaha.

Mr. POWERS. You agree that these terminals received no aid from the Government.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Well, I am not so sure that they did.

Mr. POWERS. They did not.

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. Ithink they are proper append-

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not in opposition to the gentleman's position, but I think it is a material matter for the House to consider what rights the Government has here before we pass any law on the subject. I do not agree with a great deal of the invective which is brought into this case. I think the interest of the Government requires that there shall be some final settlement of this matter and that this railroad shall be permitted to reorganize. But I think that the bill before the House is not sufficiently favorable to the Government. It rests upon a false fundamental orable to the Government. It rests upon a false fundamental assumption that the Government does not have a lien upon certain valuable property that the courts hold it does have a lien upon.

I want to say, sir, that my position upon this question is entirely in line with the almost uniform conduct of the officers of this Government, and in line with the position of the Commissioner of Railroads, and of the Secretary of the Interior. You will find this view amplified in a letter written by Mr. Secretary Lamar, when he was Secretary of the Interior, to Charles Francis Adams, who was then the president of this railroad.

who was then the president of this railroad.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I have only a minute. Mr.

Lamar was a great jurist. He had carefully considered this question, and took the ground explicitly, and it seems to me he demonstrated, that the Government had a lien on these properties at Omaha that the committee say it does not have a lien upon. think the Government can not expect to have its second-mortgage bonds converted into first-mortgage bonds, and that it should look at this as a business matter, and that it should ask for the same security that it has now. But I believe that it should have a rate of interest upon its bonds which will at least be equal to its own or which and the net earnings of this company for a rate of five and the net earnings of this company for a rate of the same and the net earnings of this company for a rate of the same are the same and the net earnings of this company for a rate of the same are the same of interest upon its bonds which will at least be equal to its own credit, and the net earnings of this company for a period of four or five years, embracing two or three bad years, will show that the company can easily afford to pay the Government 3 per cent interest upon these second-mortgage bonds. I trust that the committee, or the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Powers], before this matter shall come to a vote, will see fit to offer an amendment making the rate of interest in the bonds 3 per cent instead of 2, and if he shall do that, it seems to me that he will make a proper concession on account of the Omaha property, which I believe the Government has a lien upon.

concession on account of the Ghala property, ...

Government has a lien upon.

Mr. HARISON. I yield the remainder of my time, fifteen minutes, to my colleague [Mr. Wheeler].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Wheeler] is recognized for fifteen minutes.

[Mr. WHEELER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Hubbard] or the gentleman from Vermont now occupy time?
Mr. POWERS. Has the hour and a half been used?
The CHAIRMAN. There remain an hour and forty minutes to the gentleman from Vermont and an hour and two minutes to the opposite side, represented by the gentleman from Missouri.
Mr. POWERS. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from California

California.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Chairman, it is related that there were two men in the wilds of North Carolina who had grown up to manhood there, never had been away from home, knew nothing of the riches of other countries or of civilization. Impelled by a desire to increase their knowledge, it is stated that they took their blankets and started off to find new fields. They walked down the mountains and over the plains, and finally came to two parallel lines of iron, as they thought, nailed upon wood, of which they knew nothing and could imagine nothing. They walked along for a time, and it became evening, and they were sleepy. They walked to the bank adjacent, spread their blankets, and went to sleep. Shortly there came along an express train, somewhat behind time, and as it came rumbling and roaring and thundering down the grade it awakened one of these men, and as he looked up he saw the headlight of the locomotive making everything light and turning night into day, and as it passed him, with its clattering noise, seeming powerful enough to wake the dead, and when he saw the fireman, reinty and colored by the redestion with the former and colored by the redesting the grimy and enlarged by the reflection, with the furnace door wide open, the sparks flying, the coals dropping, the fire roaring, and heard the whistle's shrill shriek, he grasped the man with whom he had walked and said, "Sam, the devil is moving hell, and here is the first load!" [Laughter.]

So, Mr. Chairman, there are men in this Congress who, when-ever anything is presented here touching the Pacific railroads, ever anything is presented here touching the Facinc ranroads, awake from a sleep, grasp their neighbors, and exclaim, "Huntington is moving the United States Treasury, and this is the first load!" [Laughter.] They do not seem to realize that this matter should be discussed in a business way. They do not seem to realize that the question for consideration is how the United States of America shall get back the money it has invested in this Pacific Railroad enterprise. As to the construction of the reads Pacific Railroad enterprise. As to the construction of the roads, I have not time to speak now, nor of the motives of the men who built them, nor of the work that they did, nor of how the whole subject was considered by Congress at that time. I hope to be subject was considered by Congress at that time. I hope to be able, in extending my remarks, to say something on that subject. I will, however, say a word now about the land grants of which we have heard so much. More than twenty other railroads in the United States have received greater land grants than did the Pacific railroads. It must also be remembered that the land granted was absolutely valueless until the road was built. Hence the land grant so much discussed becomes of very small moment in deciding upon the bill before us.

Mr. Chairman, when we are called upon to settle the question

Mr. Chairman, when we are called upon to settle the question as to what the United States shall get out of its second mortgage, which is the only matter before us, we are met by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] and other gentlemen with this old talk that the men who built these roads made money. All right; suppose they did make money. They did only what everybody else would do if they had had the chance. Just imagine! If these gentlemen who now denounce so fiercely the men who built the Pacific railroads had only been in their positions at the inception of that enterprise, how differently they would have acted. Suppose some of the gentlemen from the great State of California who are members of this Congress, and who—especially one of them—fight this railroad question at all times and without regard to sense or reason [laughter]—suppose that some of those gentlemen, in connection with the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Boatner] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Cooper], who out-Heroded Herod in the last Congress in denunciation of those who constructed these reads. who constructed these roads-suppose they had been engaged in that great work.

Suppose that they had built the road, and after they had completed it, seven years ahead of time, they had come together, and when the last spike had been driven at Promontory Point, and when the last spike had been driven at Promontory Point, and when all the nations of the earth were rejoicing that we had succeeded in binding together the East and the West, the waters of the Atlantic and the waters of the Pacific, I suppose that just the moment these gentlemen had finished the work they would have started for Washington, they would have invaded the East Room of the White House, they would have presented themselves before the then President of the United States (that silent man and silent general whose memory we all honor)—they would have presented themselves before him, and the gentleman from Louisiana, or perhaps the gentleman from the Fourth district of California, or the gentleman from Wisconsin would have been the spokesman, and gentleman from Wisconsin, would have been the spokesman, and

"Mr. President, we have built this road, and we have built it seven years ahead of time, but we find that by some strange miscalculation we have made some money out of it. [Laughter.] We have tion we have made some money out of it. [Laughter.] We have made some legitimately, and we have gobbled all we could get, and, on the whole, we have made a good deal of money. We have kept every agreement we have made with you; we have built the road as you wanted it built; your Government directors and your Government commission have inspected and accepted the road; we have kept every part of our contract, but, mirabile dictu, we have made money, and our consciences will not permit us to retain it; so we come now to pour it back into the Treasury of the United States." [Laughter.]

That, doubtless, is what these gentlemen would have said and done. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Cooper] might have said that he would like to have some of the money saved for the said that he would like to have some of the money saved for the improvement of the harbor of Manitowoc. [Laughter.] The gen tleman from the Fourth district of California [Mr. MAGUIRE] would probably have expressed a desire to have some of it appropriated for the propagation of the doctrine of the single tax. [Laughter.] And the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Boatner] might have asked for some to pay the expenses of his contested elections. [Laughter.] Some of it might have gone in the interest of my colleagues to Petaluma Creek, and some to building a public building at Oakland, Cal. [Laughter.] But the balance would certainly have been covered into the Treasury of the United States.

Certainly have been covered into the Treasury of the [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, would those gentlemen really have done that? Why, if Adolph Sutro, who has been bombarding Congress with letters on this subject, or if that blackmailer, Hearst, who runs the Examiner in San Francisco, had been connected with this great enterprise, they would not only have made all the money that the other men made, but they would have brought the Government itself into contempt and ruin, and would have usurped the entire control. [Laughter.] But, Mr. Chairman, the real question for us to consider is, How shall we get back our money? It is purely a business question with us. Abuse of the men who built the roads, animadversion upon their motives, or denunciations of their acts will not avail us. We must deal with the matter as it is in 1897. Our ancestors made the mistakes, if any were made, that resulted in the present status of the case.

Now, there are three ways to deal with this question. The first is to sell these roads under foreclosure to the highest bidder; the second is for the Government to take the road and run it; the second is for the Government to take the road and run it; the third is to extend the time for the payment of the indebtedness. I apprehend that everybody in this House is opposed to the Government ownership of railroads. Every speaker so far has denounced it. No sound argument can be presented in its favor. We can eliminate that factor from the problem. The next question, then, is, Shall we foreclose? If we foreclose, how much shall we get? Who will bid? I do not ask any of these gentlemen from California to approximate that constitution because they are all mostly. we get? Who will bid? I do not ask any of these gentlemen from California to answer that question, because they are all wealthy, and if they did not have the money themselves they could call upon the committee of fifty in San Francisco and get the money from them—from Sutro or from Hearst—and thus they could bid on this property. [Laughter.] But I ask gentlemen from other parts of the United States, who would bid in these properties if they were offered at auction? Name somebody. Name some corporation or some body of individuals that would or could make such a bid. There are just three parties that could bid. One would be the United States. The United States could, of course, bid could nay off the first mortgage, and then carry on the railwould be the United States. The United States could, or course, bid, could pay off the first mortgage, and then carry on the railroads. Butnobody wants that to be done. The Vanderbilts could bid, because they own a line of road leading into Omaha. But they say they do not want the property. The only other parties that could bid would be the same men who now control the Central Pacific and the Union Pacific roads. They might bid the property in at their own price, and thus get rid of paying the debt due to the Government.

If the men who control the Central Pacific—the men who have been roundly abused indirectly and directly upon the floor of this House (and who are abused by men who are here lobbying in this House to-day as ex-members of Congress against this bill) if those men should, at foreclosure by the United States, bid in this property, what could hinder them from so doing? Who could outbid them? And then what would they do? If, when this property were put up at auction, they should undertake to bid it in, who could bid against them? Nobody on earth. You all know that could bid against them? Nobody on earth. You all know that no corporation could be formed to bid against them, for corporations of that magnitude are not easily formed, especially to fight other corporations, and no individual has sufficient means to undertake the job. They would bid only enough to pay the first mortgage. Any opposing bidder, if such could be found, would bid no more, for by an expenditure of that amount they could parallel the road with a new line with less bridges, lower grades, easier curves and straighter line. No new corporation would easier curves, and straighter line. No new corporation would buy an old road at a greater sum than they could build a new one. Hence there would practically be no competition at the sale. The testimony taken before the Railway Commission and the statements made before our committee were to the effect that these roads could be duplicated for less than the amount of the these roads could be duplicated for less than the amount of the first mortgage upon them. Sixty-one million dollars in round numbers is the amount of the first mortgage upon both roads; and the roads could be duplicated for that amount. The Central Pacific road could be duplicated for less than the amount of the first mortgage upon it. Who, then, would bid? Who could, as a safe business proposition, bid against the railroad people who are in possession of the property, and who by purchase can rid themselves of a large debt. Every dollar less than the amount due the United States that these companies could secure the roads for at forced sale would be that much clear gain and the Government's loss

Did any of you ever have a second mortgage on a man's property? If so, when the second mortgage became due and you found that the property would not sell for enough to pay the first mortgage, did you foreclose and sell simply for the purpose of enabling your lawyer to make some money? Such would be the inevitable result of foreclosure in this case. Whoever buys these roads at foreclosure sale must of course purchase subject to the first mortgages, and that amount is gigantic of itself. No persons could overbid the men who now control these companies except the United States. If the Government overbid, it must, like an individual, pay the first mortgage, and that means taking $61,000,000 from an already depleted National Treasury to engage in the unwise policy of Government ownership and management of railroads.

Therefore it seems to me that from a business point of view a sale under foreclosure proceedings would be of no advantage, but a positive loss to the Government. All agree that a sale under foreclosure would result in losing at the very least one-half of the debt due the United States unless the Government bid the property in. None of us wish to lose this amount of money.

The next question is—and this I understand to be the agreement of all who have spoken—whether or not this debt should be extended. Gentlemen do not oppose the proposition for extension as a matter of principle, but only as to its details. It is said that the Government ought to get a larger rate of interest. Let us examine that question. Every man knows that a railroad is valuable only for the money that it can make; it is of no value for any other purpose. Everyone knows that a railroad company can only pay its debts out of its earnings. Everyone knows that the United States Government itself could not pay its debts if they were all presented at once. A railroad company in debt is not in were all presented at once. A railroad company in debt is not in a different position from anybody else, nation, corporation, or individual, who is indebted. There is not a bank in the United States, except one, I believe, that could pay its debts if they were States, except one, I believe, that could pay its debts if they were all presented at once. There is not a bank in California (and it is the greatest State in the Union, as you all know)—and it has some Congressmen who are bank directors—there is not a bank in California that could pay its debts if they were presented all at once. These railroad companies, then, are in no worse condition than the United States Government or the banks or the general people. The question being, How shall we extend their indebtedness? its solution depends solely upon the ability of the railroad companies to comply with our conditions and to pay us our debt from panies to comply with our conditions and to pay us our debt from their only source of revenue, their earnings. If we agree to extend the indebtedness, clearly we can do nothing but impose such terms as they can comply with. What is the good of calling upon a man to pay $1,000,000 when he can not do it? What is the good of askto pay $1,000,000 when he can not do it? What is the good of asking a man to pay 6 per cent, or 5 per cent, or 4 per cent interest upon his debt due us when he can not do it? Therefore, in making terms with these railroad companies, we should look, as I have before said, solely at their earning capacity? Is that not true?

Now, the question is, What is the earning capacity of these roads? What are the net earnings of the railroads? It will not do for us to assume that the gentleman from Missouri is correct when he says that the net earnings of the railroad companies are when he says that the net earnings of the railroad companies are the amounts that they receive over and above their operating expenses. Those are not net earnings. The net earnings of a rail-road company are the earnings that they have to apply to a reduc-tion of their indebtedness or payment of dividends after they have paid all of their fixed charges, including interest upon their debts. The Central Pacific road—and I speak of that because I am more familiar with it—the Central Pacific road for the last five years has had an average of $291,967 as a surplus applicable to the payment of our indebtedness, and that is all. Is that too much to leave for emergencies that frequently arise? In the committee's estimate of the amount to be paid by these companies we have put an item for payment of interest at 4 per cent upon their first-mortgage indebtedness. Is this correct? Should we estimate that mortgage indebtedness. Is this correct? Should we estimate that they can refund their old debt at 4 per cent? I do not think so. Money is not plentiful for railroad corporations at such a low rate of interest. I think they would have to pay at least 4½ per cent, and if so, that will use up all of the surplus and consume all the earnings of these roads. We are estimating the earnings upon the figures as given by the officers of the Central Pacific.

Now, it may be, as has been intimated, that they lied. Now, it may be, as has been intimated, that they lied. But, Mr. Chairman, let us consider the facts for a moment. When the gentlemen insinuate that the officers of these roads, in their statements made under oath to the officers of the Government, are lying, they are simply having a reflex of their own minds, it seems to me. We must assume that they tell the truth to the stockholders and to themselves. Men may lie on the outside, especially when engaged in business which would make such a system profitable. But when they are dealing with themselves it is to be able. But when they are dealing with themselves, it is to be assumed that they will at least tell the truth to themselves. These are reports that they make themselves to themselves about the condition of their business. It must be conceded that they are correct. They cover their affairs for five years last past. They are accepted by the officers of the United States charged with that duty in dealing with the companies, and must therefore be treated by us, as other officers of the United States, as being true.

In reference to the Central Pacific, these are the earnings. say they can not pay more. The books of the company justify their statement. We must show error or accept these figures. No error has been charged or insinuated. The amount, then, of earnings the committee has named being correct, it naturally fol-lows that the payments to be exacted from the company can not exceed the sums named by the committee, and that the rate of interest can not be increased. In the Central Pacific we receive additional security. That road, Mr. Chairman—that is, that portion covered by the Government mortgage—is like one of Gunter's novels, "Miss Nobody of Nowhere." It commences in the plains of Utah and ends 50 miles from San Francisco. It runs for 580 miles from Utah to Truckee in California, through a country that does not have business enough to pay for the oil that greases that does not have business enough to pay for the oil that greases the locomotives that draw the trains through that region. [Laughter.] All the business that pays them is from California and the through travel. We can rely only on the California and through business for revenue to the company from which to pay us our debt; clearly, then, we should get the road into such condition that it can get that business.

What is the chiest of a milroad company? It is to get from

What is the object of a railroad company? It is to get from somewhere to somewhere, from some city to another city. What makes the Baltimore and Ohio, and the Pennsylvania, and the New York Central valuable? It is because they begin at some great city and end at another. They have business between, it is true, in the thickly settled portions of the East, but the Central Pacific has no paying way business except in California. What is the object of reaching California by a railroad? To get to the city of San Francisco. If it did not get to San Francisco it would have no value, The aided portion of the Central Pacific does not reach San Francisco. Now, the proposition of the bill is to permit the United States to have a mortgage on property that will mit the United States to have a mortgage on property that will mit the United States to have a mortgage on property that will enable the Government, if it is obliged to take the road, to get into the city of San Francisco. They propose, in addition to what the Government now has, to have a mortgage on a road leading north, as you will see by reference to the map, up into Oregon, through a very fertile valley that will make money. There is another mortgage on a road leading directly south, as you will also see hyperference to the lines on that man into the San Josquin also see by reference to the lines on that map, into the San Joaquin Valley, and another from Niles to Oakland, and the ferry from Oakland to San Francisco, and the terminals at both cities, thus giving us a road commencing at some place and ending at the center of wealth and business and civilization on the Pacific Its arms thus extended, one to the north, the other to the south, and its head resting in San Francisco, will enable the road, in case the United States is obliged to take possession of it in the future, to obtain business from California's fertile valleys and enterprising cities, and thus secure revenue from other than mere overland traffic. If taken now, the United States will have absolutely no business save the through overland trade, and that is not enough, and it will be in possession of a road without beginning or end, barred from the Bay of San Francisco, and dependent upon connecting lines for paying business. If this bill passes and de-fault is made, and the United States is obliged to take possession, it will have a road which will be able to do business without asking the permission of anyone. So if the United States is obliged to take it at all, it will be in a position where it can make money.

Now, what are the other propositions embodied in this bill? We Now, what are the other propositions embodied in this bill? We provide that they shall make payment of principal and interest every six months. At the end of the first six months they must make such payment, at the end of another six months a further payment, and unless these payments are made the bill provides that the entire debt of the road shall become immediately due, at the option of the President. We have a guarantee, therefore, of the good faith of the company. In addition to that there is a guarantee of the Southern Pacific Company, a gigantic corporation, as my friends from California often say, a wealthy corporation, as I hear them say continually; a corporation that has dominated everything throughout that country, and wealthier than any other corporation. thing throughout that country, and wealthier than any other corporation in the country, as I have often heard them say—and that corporation guarantees the performance of the contract of the Central Pacific.

tral Pacific.

We are absolutely safe, then, in getting the money, and we ought to pass the bill and get the money due to the Government. Individually, as I have said, I would be in favor of wiping out the entire debt. That, of course, would help my people in California. If the roads did not have this debt upon their shoulders, they could reduce their rates of fare and transportation, and that would help my people; but as a citizen, and for the welfare of the whole country, I am in favor of making these railroads pay their debts, and on that theory I favor the bill because I believe that will be the result of it if it goes into operation. But they say that the State of California is against this bill. Well, now, the mere fact that the State of California is against a bill is entitled to considerable weight, perhaps, but it does not settle the question. But siderable weight, perhaps, but it does not settle the question. But before this point can be considered it must be conclusively established that the people of California are against the bill. I know of one man from California that is not against this bill, and that is myself. I am not at all afraid to express my sentiments. I will show later that the voice of my State is not unanimous against this bill, but that a fair majority are for it, as evidenced by the newspapers of California.

I hope the chairman of the assemble with the control of the chairman of the assemble with the control of the chairman of the assemble with the control of the chairman of the assemble with the chairman of the control of the control of the chairman of the chairman of the control of the control of the control of the chairman of the chairman of the control of

Mr. JOHNSON of California. There is not a man from California in this House, if he dared to express his honest sentiments, but what would be in favor of this bill, always excepting the gentleman from the Seventh [Mr. Bowers]. Every other man, if he dared to express his honest sentiments, would be in favor of this bill, but they are all afraid of a blackmailing newspaper in San Francisco. They are afraid of the attacks made upon them and upon others by this blackmailer.

The opposition in California is unreasonable and hollow. It makes up in noise what it lacks in solidity. It mistakes vituners makes up in noise what it lacks in solidity. It mistakes vituperation for argument, abuse for reason, caricatures for facts.

The traveler across the Western plains has frequently been deprived of needed rest and felt compelled to mount guard all night by hearing the most unearthly and hideous noises coming seemingly from every quarter of the horizon, and apparently from the lungs of a thousand wild animals anxious to rend his limbs the lungs of a thousand wild animals anxious to rend his limbs and feast upon the bodies of his horses, his family, and himself. Often has he paced the weary rounds of his camp with heart quickly beating, rifle in hand, finger on trigger, nervously waiting an assault while praying for the morning to come that he might face and fight in daylight the fierce wild beasts that, as he thought, encircled him. When at last the glorious orb of day came rising above the eastern horizon, illumining the whole earth, driving darkness away and giving renewed vigor to man and beast and flower and shrub alike he has carefully scanned the country rount. darkness away and giving renewed vigor to man and beast and flower and shrub alike, he has carefully scanned the country round about him that he might see the hordes that he thought had all night watched and waited for his death, when lo he found that two measly, gaunt coyotes had furnished all the noise and given him all the terror of his wasted night. So with this California opposition to this funding bill. If you turn the sunlight of truth upon it, destroy its secrecy, and show its true relations to the subject, you will find that all this noise, this opposition, this denunciation of the funding bill and its friends, all this fearful wail against Huntington and the railroad and the friends of funding comes from two persons gifted like the coyote, with leather lungs. comes from two persons gifted, like the coyote, with leather lungs, innate wickedness, and an infernal desire to injure all that they can not control.

These two are Adolph Sutro, by some mischance mayor of San Francisco, and William R. Hearst, by the gift of his parents the proprietor of the San Francisco Examiner—arcades Ambo.

of Sutro but little need be said. He admits his opposition to be founded upon personal spite against C. P. Huntington. Poor old man. I have naught but pity for him. He is undoubtedly crazy. The city and county attorney of San Francisco, Hon. H. T. Creswell, a Democrat, a lawyer of high standing, a citizen well known and respected, has on two occasions publicly stated that, in his opinion, based upon official and personal intimacy with him, Satro is inseen and should be examined by a compission of lungary. Sutro is insane and should be examined by a commission of lunacy and sent to the insane asylum. Hon, William Broderick, county auditor of San Francisco, a Democrat, a man of sterling integrity and great ability, indorses and echoes the views of Mr. Creswell. Hence we can afford to let the lurid-covered envelopes and liter-ature of Sutro pass unheeded as being the emanations of a brain diseased, the product of a mind gone mad.

Of the other of this precious pair of literary coyotes, William R. Hearst, much could be said.

He is a young man, rich not by his own exertions, but by inheritance from his honored father and gifts from his honored mother.

He became possessed of the idea that he wanted to run a newspaper. Like the child in the song, "he wanted a bow wow," and his indulgent parents gave him the Examiner. By the reckless expenditure of large sums of money he has built up a great paper, The Examiner has a very large circulation. It did have a great in Colifornia.

It has done great good in California. It has exposed corruption, denounced villainy, unearthed wickedness, pursued criminals, and rewarded virtue.

At first we Californians were suspicious of "Our Willie," as Hearst is called on the Pacific Coast. We did not know what he meant. But we came to believe in him and his oft-repeated boasts of independence and honesty. Daily editorials written by "Our Willie's "hired men praising his motives and proclaiming his honesty had their effect. Besides, "Our Willie" through his paper was doing some good.

We knew him to be a debauchee, a dude in dress, an Anglomaniac in language and manners, but we thought he was hones we knew him to be incentious in his tastes, regal in his dissipations, unfit to associate with pure women or decent men, but we thought "Our Willie" was honest.

We knew he was erotic in his tastes, erratic in his moods, of small understanding and smaller views of men and measures, but we thought "Our Willie," in his English plaids, his Cockney accent, and his middle-parted hair, was honest.

We knew he had sought on the banks of the Nile relief from loathsome disease contracted only by contagion in the haunts of oathsome disease contracted only by contagion in the haunts of vice, and had rivaled the Khedive in the gorgeousness of his harem in the joy of restored health, but we still believed him honest, though low and depraved.

We knew he was debarred from society in San Francisco because of his delight in flaunting his wickedness, but we believed him honest, though tattooed with sin.

We knew he was ungrateful to his friends, unkind to his employees, unfaithful to his business associates, but we believed he was trying to publish an honest paper.

We knew he had money, not earned by himself (for we knew he was unable to earn any money save as a statue for a cigar store), but given him by honored and indulgent parents; we knew he needed no bribes with which to pay his way, hence, while we knew all these things, we did believe "Our Willie" to be honest.

We thought that he was running an independent newspaper on a plane far above the ordinary altitude of newspapers, with a sincere desire to do good to the world, with an honest wish to expose shams, to speak the truth, and to establish a paper that, while it might be a personal organ, would still be an honest one. We came finally to admire "Our Willie" and to speak well of him and his paper.

When William R. Hearst commenced his abusive tirades against C. P. Huntington and the Southern Pacific Company and the Central Pacific Railroad Company and all who were friendly to them, and to denounce the funding bill and all who favored it as thieves and robbers, we thought his course was wrong, his meth-ods bad, and his attacks brutal, but we believed "Our Willie" to be honest in it.

When C. P. Huntington told the truth about "Our Willie" and showed that he was simply fighting the railroad funding bill because he could get no more blackmail from the Southern Pacific because he could get no more blackmail from the Southern Pacific because he could get no more blackmail from the Southern Pacific because he could get no more blackmail from the Southern Pacific because he could get no more blackmail from the Southern Pacific because he could get no more blackmail from the Southern Pacific because he could get no more blackmail from the Southern Pacific because he could get no more blackmail from the Southern Pacific because he could get no more blackmail from the Southern Pacific because he could get no more blackmail from the Southern Pacific because he could get no more blackmail from the Southern Pacific because he could get no more blackmail from the Southern Pacific because he could get no more blackmail from the Southern Pacific because he could get no more blackmail from the Southern Pacific because he could get no more blackmail from the Southern Pacific because he could get no more blackmail from the Southern Pacific because he could get no more blackmail from the Southern Pacific because he could get no more blackmail from the Southern Pacific because he could get no more blackmail from the Southern Pacific because he could get no more blackmail from the Southern Pacific because he could get no more blackmail from the Southern Pacific because he could get no more blackmail from the Southern Pacific because he could get no more blackmail from the Southern Pacific because he could get no more blackmail from the Southern Pacific because he could get no more blackmail from the southern Pacific because he could get no more blackmail from the southern Pacific because he could get no more blackmail from the southern Pacific because he could get no more blackmail from the southern pacific because he could get no more blackmail from the southern pacific because he could get n Company, we were dazed with the charge, and as Californians we were humiliated.

We looked eagerly for "Our Willie's" denial, but it came not. On the contrary, he admitted that he had blackmailed the Southern Pacific Company into a contract whereby they were to pay him $30,000 to let them alone, and that he had received $22,000 of his blackmail, and that C. P. Huntington had cut it off as soon as he knew of it, and that he was getting even now on Huntington and the railroad company because he had not received the other $8,000 of his bribe. He admitted by silence that the Southern Pacific of his bribe. He admitted by silence that the Southern Pacific Company was financially responsible, but that he dared not sue it for the $8,000 he claimed to be due because of fear that his blackmail would be exposed in court.

With brazen effrontery only equaled by the lowest denizen of the haunts of vice "Our Willie" knows so well in every city of the globe, he unblushingly admitted he had blackmailed the railroad company, but pleaded in extenuation that he did not keep his contract, but swindled them out of their money.

He showed himself to be the correct exponent of a scoundrel, as defined by Bill Tweed, namely, "A man who wouldn't stay bought." I can not tell how sad I felt to learn of this phase of Hearst's life. I had been his attorney. I had regarded Hearst as honest. I had praised his Examiner for its course, because I believed it to be dictated by honest, although at times mistaken, ideas.

To learn "Our Willie" was nothing but a common, ordinary, everyday blackmailer—a low highwayman of the newspaper world—grieved the people of California, myself included.

I regret it. For the honor of California I wish this exposé had never been necessary; but it is true, sadly true.

We have lost on the Pacific Coast an idol. We mourn a leader.

We have lost on the Pacific Coast an idol. We mourn a leader. We grieve over a dead and wicked newspaper.

People read the paper because it gives the news in large type, but they say while reading it, "Isn't it too bad Hearst should have sold himself. We did not expect it. He must be wicked at heart, for he didn't need the money."

If it be given to spirits of the departed to know the actions of those left behind them on this earth, the honored and respected father of "Our Willie" is suffering now from the blackmailing conduct of his son. [Laughter.]

And that is the man who has created all this furor in California. He has intimidated men. He has intimidated people. You do not know the terrorism that he has exercised in California with his paper. It is a paper that has a large circulation. You know his paper. It is a paper that has a large circulation. You know how it has abused and maligned and caricatured people in this House, the honored chairman of our committee [Mr. POWERS], and other members of our committee, and our honored Speaker. I will not speak of myself, because I do not know but what I can get reasonably even with this man before I get through with him. [Laughter.] But he has carried it on for years. While we knew [Laughter.] But he has carried it on for years. While we knew all these things about him, we believed he was honest because he said he was, because he had his newspaper; but he has debauched the public mind in California by terrorism, he has terrorized over the public mind in California by terrorism, he has terrorized over everyone, he has issued his edicts that any man who dares to favor this funding bill shall be driven from public life, shall be ruined in private life, and shall be disgraced before the people and before the gods. But for one, knowing that I am right, knowing that this is a business settlement of the question, I am willing to stand for what I believe to be right, even if this blackmailing paper does continue to assault me.

These two persons have caused great opposition to the funding bill in San Francisco, but even there, where they have been aided by another paper owned by a business rival of the Southern Pacific company, they are alone practically.

A number of papers in San Francisco of equal prominence with Hearst's organ, not smarting under loss of blackmail, favor the funding bill. Nearly if not quite nine-tenths of the newspapers in California outside of San Francisco favor a funding bill.

In the Congressional district that I have the honor to represent I do not know of but four newspapers that empose the funding

In the Congressional district that I have the honor to represent I do not know of but four newspapers that oppose the funding bill. In the cities of Stockton, Marysville, Nevada, Grass Valley, and Sacramento, the papers, I believe, are unanimous for the bill. The city of Auburn has two papers favoring it. The thriving town of Jackson has two papers favoring it. The city of Oroville, one paper favoring it. So I could go on all over the district giving names and location of the papers that favor the funding bill. All of them are representative papers. They represent all shades of political belief.

The Chamber of Commerce of Sacramento, the capital of the State, composed of 176 representative business men of all classes of a city of 30,000 inhabitants, adopted unanimously the following resolution in favor of the bill:

SACRAMENTO, February 12, 1896.

At the regular annual meeting of the Sacramento Chamber of Commerce the following resolution was offered and passed unanimously:
Whereas it is important for the welfare of our community and our State that an early solution be had of the question of the indebtedness of the Central Pacific and Union Pacific railroads to the Government; and
Whereas we believe that any measure which will require the payment of said indebtedness upon reasonable terms would best subserve the interests of the people; and
Whereas the application of business principles to this indebtedness would indicate that an extension of the time for the payment of this indebtedness would be the best solution of the question to the end that the future finances of said railroads may be clear, and said properties be used, improved, and extended to their utmost capacity, with the object of insuring corresponding benefits to producers and shippers: Therefore,

Bett resolved, That our representatives in Congress be requested to favor any measure which will provide for the settlement of such indebtedness upon reasonable terms within a period of fifty years.

JOSEPH STEFFENS, President.

So it is all over the State. A majority, as I am informed of the

So it is all over the State. A majority, as I am informed, of the newspapers in the district represented by Mr. McLachlan, and that represented by Mr. Bowers, and that represented by Mr. Barham support the bill.

Why, then, all this talk about California being opposed to the proper settlement of this question?

I may remark right here that there is a man from California.

I may remark right here that there is a man from California, who is a member of this House, who has undertaken at certain times to defend this man Hearst, and no doubt he will now. If he does, I hope he will fool no man in reference to the matter. It is a question of defending a blackmailer, and not of defending a newspaper.

Now, in conclusion, in reference to this matter, shall we pay any attention to the wailings of this blackmailer; shall we pay attention to the shrieks of this man Sutro; or shall we pay attention to the settlement of a business matter, and settle it once and forever upon business principles? It is purely and solely a business question. It does not rise to the dignity of anything else. All talk of the past should be forgotten. Let us look at the present. Let us not think whether or not we would have done better than those men who built the road. I hate to think of what some many would have done if they had had the chance of these men who men would have done if they had had the chance of these men who built the road. [Laughter.] Of course I do not allude to any man in this House, but I hate to think of what would have been the result if others I could name had been given the opportunity to construct these railroads.

Now, is not this a business question? In regard to the Union Pacific, I frankly confess I am not familiar with that road. I have read their statement and the proposed settlement, and it seems fair and full. So far as the Central Pacific is concerned, I am familiar; and I want to say that as a Californian I am proud of its action. Under the act of 1862 the Central Pacific built 31 miles of its road where the Union Pacific did not build a single mile and could not until the act of 1864 was passed. As a Californian I am proud on the could not until the act of 1864 was passed. mile, and could not until the act of 1864 was passed. As a Californian I am proud of the Central Pacific, because of all of the railroads aided by the Government that is the only road that never has defaulted on its interest and never has failed to keep every contract it made with the Government and with everybody else. It is the only aided road that has never gone into the hands of a receiver. When gentlemen speak here about that railroad being unable to keep its contract, they do not speak with reference to the fact. They are simply speaking of their own feeling; for I repeat, that road so far has kept every contract it made with the Government. It has never defaulted. It has paid every dollar of its indebtedness as it became due.

It stands ready to-day to take up this contract and to carry it on. But gentlemen say the rate of interest is too small. They say 2 per cent is too small a rate. Why is it too small? It is all they can pay. You say they could pay more. Why? The mere fact that a man says so does not prove anything. The earnings are shown for five years by the report, and they show that this road can not pay any larger sum than it is proposed to pay. This debt the railroad will commence paying immediately. In the first year $1,500,000 of principal and interest, in addition to $2,400,000 of old debt. The charges upon this road are fixed by law, and they can be ascertained by everyone. The charges fixed for 1896 are $4,326,000. I ask every member of this House to drop everything except the common-sense, business view, and to accept the settlement of this question on a business line. Remove it from politics; remove it from Congress; remove it so that the blackmailer no longer can hold it in terrorem against men, but will be obliged to allow everybody to carry out their ideas as to them obliged to allow everybody to carry out their ideas as to them seems proper. [Applause.]

passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 3219) donating condemned cannon and cannon balls to Wadsworth Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Helena, Mont.;

A bill (S. 3035) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth Gnash;

A bill (S. 2393) for the relief of William E. Bond;

A bill (S. 2338) for the relief of Joshua Bishop;

A bill (S. 811) to provide a district attorney and marshal for the western judicial district of the State of South Carolina;

A bill (S. 687) to apply the unexpended balance of the amount heretofore appropriated for the relief of the captain, owners, officers, and crew of the late United States private armed brig General Armstrong, their heirs, executors, administrators, agents, General Armstrong, their heirs, executors, administrators, agents, or assigns; and

A bill (S. 470) granting to the State of Washington certain lands therein situated for the purpose of a fish hatchery.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 3877) granting a pension to Henderson Marple.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 2663) to amend the laws relating to navigation, asked a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendment, and had appointed Mr. FRYE, Mr. NELSON, and Mr. WHITE as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 2259) for the relief of William B. Ellis in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

PACIFIC RAILROAD BILL.

The committee again resumed its session.

Mr. POWERS. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Arnold].

Mr. Arnold].

Mr. Arnold].

Mr. Arnold].

Mr. Chairman, I will detain the House but a very few moments, as my time is limited. I desire in the first place to repeat what has been frequently said upon the floor of this House, and that is that this is a business proposition. All these allegations of peculation and of fraud in connection with the building of these roads has, I believe, no place in the discussion before this House. It may be true, as alleged, that a large amount of money was made in the construction of these roads. It may be true that they have paid large dividends, some of which money should at least have been paid to the Government. It is true beyond question that when Congress many years ago postponed by an act of Congress the Government lien, a mistake was committed. But with all these things we have nothing to do. We are confronted, in the language of another gentleman, with "a condition and not a theory" about peculations and any allegations in reference to fraud. These all may have occurred. I know nothing about it, and many members here know nothing about it whatever. We do know to-day, however, there are due this Government something like $110,000,000 from the Union Pacific and Central Pacific railroads, and it becomes our duty as members of All these allegations of peculation and of fraud in connec-Central Pacific railroads, and it becomes our duty as members of this House to ascertain, if we can, how we may best get our money back and how certainly we may get it back.

As the gentleman from California stated, and as I have said, there are practically two propositions before this House. One is to extend this indebtedness according to the terms of this bill, and the other is Government ownership of these railroads; indeed, it was asserted time and time again before the Committee on the Pacific Railroads, by gentlemen who will argue against this bill to-day, that the very purpose of preventing the funding of this debt was that the Government might become the owner of the roads. I desire to state further that the committee in considering and preparing this bill had two objects in view, the first being that the Government should get its money, and the second that it should get that money as rapidly as the earning power of these roads would permit.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Hubbard], my genial friend the Doctor, who has spent a large portion of his time in prescribing for dead patients [laughter], stated that the net earnprescribing for dead patients [laughter], stated that the net earnings of these roads were largely in excess of the amounts stated by Mr. Tweed before the committee. As the gentleman from California stated, we obtained the very best information possible, and the gentleman from Missouri misleads this body when he states that the net earnings of these roads ran in 1890 to over $6,000,000, in 1891 to $7,400,000, in 1892 to over $5,000,000. The gentleman, I say, is not fair, because he omitted to state that he had not deducted from these alleged net earnings the moneys paid into the sinking fund, or the interest on the mortgage indebtedness, which, with other sums, would reduce the net earnings to about the sinking fund, or the interest on the mortgage indebtedness, which, with other sums, would reduce the net earnings to about the amount claimed by Mr. Tweed.

The net earnings in 1890 were $898,000; in 1891, a little over $2,000,000; in 1892, $861,000; in 1893, $784,000; in 1894, $441,000, and in 1895, $420,000; an average of $812,000. During that time there was $530,000 taken out of the net earnings and paid annually into the Treasury. The committee examined this question very carefully, and they deemed it especially important to ascertain how far and to what extent we could tax these companies to tain how far and to what extent we could tax these companies to pay the debt due the Government. In that connection the ques-tion of interest was all important—whether we could afford to fix such a high rate of interest as would make it absolutely impossible for them to pay it, and whether we should require such a large sum during each year as to defeat the whole purpose of the bill.

We examined these questions with great care, and our calculation is that after paying under this plan on the principal at the rate of $365,000 the first year—$1,000 for every day in the year—$550,000 the second year, and $750,000 annually thereafter until the debt is paid, with interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum on the extended indebtedness, and with the payment of these sums on the principal of the debt, the earning power of these roads would be taxed to its utmost limit. In other words, as was suggested by the gentleman from California [Mr. Johnson], an addition of even one-half per cent to the rate of interest which they propose on the first-mortgage lien would more than eat up the small tion of even one-nair per cent to the rate of interest which they propose on the first-mortgage lien would more than eat up the small balance that would be left in the Treasury, and, as the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Powers] has stated, it is very important that some small amount shall remain in the Treasury. So, in framing this bill, we have simply done the very best we could in view of the earning capacity of the roads. I have no doubt in my mind of the shill treasury these roads to pay for two reasons. First because earning capacity of the roads. I have no doubt in my mind of the ability of these roads to pay, for two reasons: First, because we do not tax them beyond their ability, and second, because the next generation, after all of us have gone, will see such magnifi-cent development in the West as will increase the value of these properties immensely. As the gentleman from California has stated, they are valuable only because of their earning power, and as the great West settles up the earning power of these roads will largely increase.

Again, to show the safeguards which the committee have endeavored to throw about this bill, let me suggest this point. The companies, under the terms of this bill, can not pay any dividends upon their stock until they shall have first made these annual payments on the principal and shall have paid all the interest under the terms of the bill, and then they can not pay over 4 per cent dividends. Any amount in excess of that is to go to the liquidation of

Again, it was alleged that this was simply an extension sought by the Central Pacific road for the purpose of getting rid of payment altogether; that they had no intention to pay. It was alleged by gentlemen from California that the Southern Pacific alleged by gentlemen from California that the Southern Pacific was a great and rich corporation; that it had absolutely ruined the Central Pacific property, and that the Central Pacific, therefore, could not earn its share of the money to pay this debt; in fact, that the property was not worth even the first lien.

Now, in order to protect the Government against those allegations, whether they be true or false, we have previded in this bill that the Southern Pacific Company shall guarantee the payment of the principal and interest as it becomes due. We have gone further and have investigated the charter of the Southern Pacific road to ascertain whether under the charter it has the power to make the gnaranty—whether it would be bound in law by such & make the guaranty-whether it would be bound in law by such & guaranty. All these questions have been carefully examined. Now, I want to say, without boasting and without attempting to flatter any of the members of the committee, that I know this committee has labored earnestly and most assiduously in the preparation of this bill. The subject has been before Congress for years. The time has come for the settlement of the question. The President of the United States in his last message has stated that some action would necessarily be taken by the Executive unless Congress would move in this matter. I believe this is a just and heavet hill. The principal expectation to it comes from just and honest bill. The principal opposition to it comes from the Pacific Coast. Now, I have nothing to say as to the allega-tions against Mr. Huntington, either for or against them. I do not know anything about them, so far as I am concerned. But I do know this, that in all departments of life—in political life, in to know this, that in all departments of life—in political life, in business life, in professional life—success, wherever you find it, succeeds only a short time before there follows a lot of mud slinging in the rear. You have all experienced that. Furthermore, the principal opposition to this bill comes from the State of California.

California.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. POWERS. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. ARNOLD of Pennsylvania. I simply wish to say to the House that we are not to legislate for the State of California.

Much as I admire that State, much as I want to see that prosperous State still more prosperous, much as I want to see the prosperity of the people of that State advanced, I wish to say that we are legislating for the entire Union. Let the fight as between Mr.
Sutro and Mr. Hearst on the one side and Mr. Huntington on the other go on to the hearts' content of the combatants. But let us address ourselves to the question before us, which is not their fight, but the question how the Government can save its money.

The proposition to defeat this bill is simply in the interests of Populism pure and simple—the Government ownership of rail-

Populism pure and simple—the Government ownership of rail-roads. I might say, as I have stated before, that there are just two questions before this House—either pass this bill or have the Gov-ernment ownership of railroads. I am opposed, as I believe the ernment ownership of railroads. I am opposed, as I believe the vast majority of this House is, to any Government ownership of railroads. We are trying to get out of the railroad business instead of getting into it. [Applause.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I believe that under the rules we on our side have the closing of this debate.

Mr. Hepburn. I call the attention of my colleague on the committee [Mr. Powers] to the fact that there will not be to-day that full amount of time, because under the rules there must be a recess taken promptly at 5 o'clock.

Mr. POWERS. I am aware that four or five minutes will be lost by somebody; and I am willing to divide the loss with the gentleman from Missouri, one-half the time to be taken for his side and one-half for ours. Is that fair?

Mr. Hubbard. Yes, sir.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, there is only a word that I want to say at this time. I desire to call attention to a fact which I think some members are not familiar with, and it is this: The Government directors of the Pacific railroads are unanimously in favor of a foreclosure by the Government. Their report for 1895 so recommends, and they indorse that recommendation in their report of this year, and among them are such men

[Here the hammer fell.]
Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Chairman, I now yield seven minutes and a half to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].
Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I have given weeks of study to this matter ever since I heard it was coming before this body at this session of Congress.

How I can tell my conclusions in seven minutes and a half I do not know, but I have studied this question from the ground of not know, but I have studied this question from the ground of what a prudent man would do in a case of this kind.

None of these reports puts before Congress the net average earnings of these companies for the last ten years. This is information which must be obtained from various books. None of these reports shows the average fixed charges. I have that information from the Railroad Commissioner. I find that in the last eight years the Central Pacific paid all its first-mortgage interest on all classes of securities; that it paid $7,400,000 of dividends; that it put five and three-quarters millions into its sinking funds and put four and a half millions into the United States sinking fund; and that its net earnings over the first-mortgage interest, instead of being nothing, were $2,400,000 a year, and were sufficient to pay over 4 per cent on the claim of the United States against it, a claim, instead of being, as originally, $27,000,000 of principal, has been increased until the net claim now is somewhere near $60,000,000.

The Union Pacific is in the hands of receivers. Their reports show the same result. Their net earnings over the first mortgage, if you take out sinking funds, were, per year, $2,778,000—enough to pay 5 per cent on the claim of the United States. And these are the figures for the last ten years—bad years for railroads. Under these circumstances the United States Government is going to borrow money to pay off $60,000,000 worth of bonds. Is it then to receive in return 2 per cent, not only on that, but on what it has already paid for interest, on which payments for interest it has already lost a sum of money which, I believe, amounts to about $26,000,000? about $26,000,000?

These roads are not insolvent; nor need the Government take possession; nor need they be foreclosed; nor need it foreclose. Receivers are now operating the Union Pacific for the benefit of those concerned. The Government lien applied by the original statute of 1864 to all property of the whole line of road and all property of both these railways. The Supreme Court has not said that the lien does not extend to all that property, but that it does not affect any road which has not been helped by subsidies. If the lien be defective, we as the holders of a mortgage on part of a plant have a right to insist that the first mortgage on the whole plant shall be so administered and marshaled as to give us the benefit of the lien on the whole. That is law and equity. We have this right in any foreclosure which may be made.

What is more, the Government can not be foreclosed. The first mortgagees can take possession; they can hold the property and apply the rents and profits through a receiver and prevent the Government in all fairness from taking any more for sinking Government in all fairness from taking any more for sinking funds and can pay off their mortgage with the income, rents, and profits, which would pay it off, even at 6 per cent. But they can not say that the Government has been guilty of laches in not exercising an equity of redemption; and they can not foreclose, and it is not fair that they should foreclose, the people of the United States.

Now, when, after thirty years of waiting, the right has accrued to the Government of the United States to insist upon the payment of its debt out of whatever assets the company has, is this Congress to accept the very first proposition that is made to it—a proposition that the one hundred and thirteen and a half million dollars which these companies owe shall be paid on an average in fifty years, with interest at 2 per cent, and that we shall lose from fifty years, with interest at 2 per cent, and that we shall lose from 1 to 1½ per cent every year in the interest we pay on the money that we have borrowed to pay interest, or shall borrow to pay the principal, now coming due?

One and a half per cent for fifty years on $113,000,000 is somewhere about $80,000,000, which this bill would give away, although the property that is left, without counting any right of recourse to anyone to restore the lien of the Government on property that has been taken away, is amply sufficient to pay the whole debt included in both the first mortgage and the Government lien at any fair rate of interest.

any fair rate of interest

any fair rate of interest.

Mr. HUBBARD. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Bell].

Mr. BELL of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, as strange as these proceedings may seem, we are now trying to pass a bill for the Pacific railroad companies and in derogation of the sacred rights of the people of the United States. The act creating these roads gives possession, control, and management of them to the Governgives possession, control, and management of them to the Government without legal process or hindrance upon default of the payments required by the act; hence the Government is now amply protected. No doubt but the country, as well as this House, was greatly surprised at the special plea and specious defense made of these companies by the distinguished chairman of the Railroad Committee. For the first time, probably, since the organization of these companies, we have found a distinguished United States official not financially interested who commends, extols, and upholds what every historian as well as the public press and traditions of the people consider the most disgraceful piece of legerdetions of the people consider the most disgraceful piece of legerde-main and unpardonable corruption and scandal that has ever blotted the bright escutcheon of the American Government.

The chairman declared that after the United States granted the charter the contrivers of these roads failed to build, that they returned to Congress and reported that by reason of the Government's first mortgage they could not secure money, and that Congress patriotically withdrew its first lien and took a second mortgage. Mr. Larrabee, an old railroad manager, an ex-Republican governor of the State of Iowa, and the author of that splendid book on the evolution of railroads, as a historian, has given a different version of this transaction. He says it is true that the manipulators of these roads assumed the garb of patriotism and appealed to the Government for help, warning them that if they did not connect the West with the East they would lose the great country west of the Mississippi River. That Congress, without hesitation, much consideration, or debate, granted the charter of 1802. That these manipulators of men, seeing their efforts so fruitful and the obstacles so trifling, reached the con-clusion that they might, with a small effort, obtain most anything from Congress they might demand. Therefore, they doubled their demands and secured all they asked. He, and every committee and every man that has ever written upon the subject, pronounces the building and operation of these roads the most scandalous and fraudulent transaction with which the American people have ever been connected. Mr. Larrabee further says:

and every man that has ever written upon the subject, pronounces the building and operation of these roads the most scandalous and fraudulent transaction with which the American people have ever been connected. Mr. Laurabee further says:

The charter of the Union Pacific Railroad Company was granted by Congress on the 1st day of July, 1822. Shortly after the beginning of the ward from the second of the ward of

This company now comes to Congress and not only asks Congress to give it the whole of the debt that it owes the people, but to also loan it the credit of the Government for fifty more years. I understand it has been figured out that the difference between 2 per cent and the value of money, even at the lowest rate for which it can be had, for the time the Government credit is to be extended will equal the debt that the roads owe the Government. Therefore it would be much better for the people of the United States to give this debt to these roads without quibble than to loan them their credit for another half century with all of the Central Pacific, a competing line; has complete control of it; has one traffic manager for the two roads. The Southern Pacific, owned by the lessee, and extending from California to New Orleans, has a connecting line of steamships from there to New York, and thence across the Atlantic and to all the world, and by extending this charter, and giving them a monopoly of these two great transcontinental lines, they will continue their plunder, to the ruin and injury of the people of the great Pacific Slope.

I was surprised at the chairman of the committee and the gen-

I was surprised at the chairman of the committee and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Grow] lauding the builders of these roads as patriots and as entitled to great consideration at the hands of Congress and at the hands of the people of the United States. The evidence of Mr. Huntington, the chief moving spirit in the Southern Pacific and Central Pacific, frankly admits that these roads were built by the Contract and Finance Company, consisting of himself Laland Stanford Mark Hopkins and Mr. consisting of himself, Leland Stanford, Mark Hopkins, and Mr. Crocker, and maybe some other small interests, the same men that owned and were building the Central Pacific Railroad. He frankly admits in his testimony that the directors of the Central Pacific contracted with the directors of the Contract and Finance Pacific contracted with the directors of the Contract and Finance Company, being the same men in each board, for the building of the Central Pacific road. The Central Pacific directors took the stock and bonds, turned them over to the Finance Company, and the Finance Company built the road. When the committee of Congress investigated the subject, the railroad companies were alarmed to think the people of the United States should question their right to trade with themselves and cheat or defraud themselves are they always the rights to trade with themselves are they always the rights to trade with themselves and cheat or defraud themselves are they always the rights to trade with themselves and cheat or defraud themselves are they always the rights to trade with themselves are they always the rights to trade with the rights to trade with themselves and cheat or defraud themselves are they always the rights to trade with the rights to trade with themselves and the rights to trade with the rights to trade with the rights to trade with the rights the rights the rights to trade with the rights the r their right to trade with themselves and cheat of derrand themselves, as they claimed the right to make such contracts with themselves as they saw fit. They said to the committees of Congress that when they contracted as directors of the Central Pacific road with the directors of the Contract and Finance Company, the road with the directors of the contract and Finance Company, the same individuals, "the rule of equity, as it is written in the injunction, 'no man can serve two masters,' certainly did not apply to them, because they were acting in their own interest and were not charged with the duty of caring for others' rights, there being no other persons interested in the subject-matter."

Mr. Huntington very boldly admits that the companies spent two millions of dollars in employing lobbyists, or agents as he calls them, to appear before Congress, legislatures, and other organizations and explain their interests to the lawmakers, and admits that he is spending money now in Washington in explaining his interests to the members of Congress. In his examination before the Senate committee this colloquy took place between Senator Morgan and Mr. Huntington, viz:

Senator Morgan. I do not want to try to prove that you paid money to members of legislatures or to members of the House or Senate. I do not think that has any particular bearing on this particular case at this particular bers of legislatures or to members of the House or Senate. Ido not think that has any particular bearing on this particular case at this particular time.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. Still, I would like to say as a witness, when that question comes up, that I never did pay any money to anybody directly to influence his vote. Of course I might hire somebody to go and explain a bill to a member of the legislature or to a member of Congress, and get him to vote for it by giving him all the facts in the case. I understand the trouble to be that legislators have so much to do that they can not examine every subject; and while I can not get to talk with them, almost every member has somebody in his district who knows him and who can sit down beside him and talk the matter over with him. I can not do so if I would, and I have to get it done by others. I see that the great London and Northwestern Railway spent £50,000 to get their charter through Parliament, and nobody supposed that they bought a vote with it.

Senator MORGAN. If they did not buy votes, they violated the English custom. We have not yet got to that as a regular business.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I supposed that it was paid to attorneys.

Senator MORGAN. This report of the commission states that you had paid out a very large sum of money in this way.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. They state it at over $2,000,000. I told them that it must be more than that.

Senator MORGAN. You told them so in your deposition?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. I think I did. One railroad man told me not long ago that in Albany he always calculated to spend $250,000 a year for attorneys to go there and explain matters.

Senator MORGAN. Did that $2,000,000 which you spent come out of your private pocket?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. No.

private pocket?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. No.
Senator Morgan. Where did it come from?

Mr. HUNTINGTON. From the Contract and Finance Company, I suppose.

Leland Stanford stated upon oath that they had declared dividends or divided up stocks amounting to fifty-two millions of dol-lars at the completion of the roads. I do not mean to say or for one moment to intimate or infer that a single member of this or the other House has or could be influenced by the use of Mr. Huntington's or any other man's money. I believe such things are beneath any member of either House, and I would not have it go to the country as coming from me that any member of this body or the other was subject to influence by the direct use of money, and neither have I ever seen anything during my service to justify the slightest suspicion that any member of Congress has been corruptly influenced. But these managers and manipulators of men and lobbyists undoubtedly wield a great power in shaping legislation in this and all other countries by intrenching states to give this dent to these roads without quibble that to shaping legislation in this and an other countries by intredining loan them their credit for another half century with all of the their sympathizers and legal departments in office and by supporting expense and attending scandals.

There is more in this controversy than the mere securing of the Government debt. The Southern Pacific Railroad has leased the General Wheeler, from Alabama, than whom there is no better or more commendable Representative, weakens upon the fear that the Government might own and control a railroad. This is his weak point.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. Bell] has the groundless fear that intimidates him—that is, should these roads be taken by the Government to be operated in the interests of the people, that the patrons of the road would have a lower rate of tariff than the other people of the United States. If that would be the result of the Government ownership of railroads, the suffering people of this country would welcome it in every part of the land. But we ask no such advantage. Let the Government charge a reasonable rate on its investment. It is not the high railroad rates that destroy prosperity so much as the discrimination between different interests and combinations to make different articles pay every cent that the traffic will stand and induce the shipment, instead of placing the traffic on the actual cost of transportation with a reasonable income on the actual investment. Our demand is not that the Government build a road, or that the Government buy a road, but simply that the Government shall use the right it has already bought and paid for. It has paid for the building of this already bought and paid for. It has paid for the building of this road, and the promoters thereof have made a vast fortune out of it. There is no law in morals or elsewhere that requires the people to pay toll to outsiders on their own donations. It is not necessary that there should be any great machinery for operating these roads. They may be operated under a receiver; they may be operated by the Government directors, or they may be operated under a lease.

And, in further answer to our friends, Judge Dillon, of the United States court, in an order appointing Hon. J. B. Grinnell receiver for the Central Railroad of Iowa in 1876, said:

The railroads in the hands of the court, and in the circuit there are eight or ten, have all been run with less expense and have made more money than when they were operated by the companies, and I hope and believe under your supervision that this road will prove no exception, and that the property will be worth more at the end of the litigation.

Upon Mr. Grinnell's resignation, after nearly three years of service, Judge Grant, in asking for the discharge of his bondsmen, said:

I concur entirely in the opinion of the state commissioners that he has very much improved the condition of the road, and he left it in far superior condition to that in which he received it.

Mr. Larrabee says, in his excellent work on railroads:

Mr. Larrabee says, in his excellent work on railroads:

A number of European States, notably Prussia, France, and Belgium, as well as Australia, British India, and the British colonies in southern Africa, have adopted government ownership of railroads. The motives which led to this step in the various countries differ greatly. * * * The experiment of state ownership and management of railroads has been longest tried in Belgium, and with the best results. With an excellent service, the rates of the Belgium state roads are the lowest in Europe. Their first-class passenger tariffs are, next to the zone tariff recently adopted in the State of Hungary, the lowest in the world, and are, for the same distance, lower than those of American roads. In Prussia the state service, upon the whole, is also superior to that of private companies, and is probably equal to the public demand. In France the Government only owns and operates less important lines, but furnishes upon these a more efficient and cheaper service than private companies would either be able or disposed to furnish. The oftrepeated statement of those opposed to government regulation to the contrary notwithstanding, government ownership and management of railroads is a decided success in Europe.

Mr. Jeans (an English author on railroads) says of state railroads:

Notwithstanding the superior financial result, the lines worked by the state are those kept in the best order, and the working of which gives the greatest satisfaction to the commercial world and the public in general as regards regularity of conveyance, cheapness of transit, and the comfort of

"It is difficult to see how any unbiased person can travel on any of the state roads of Europe without coming to the same conclusion. State management offers certainly some advantages to the sion. State management offers certainly some advantages to the public. Above all, the business of the roads is not conducted for the pecuniary advantage of a few, but for the common good. Commerce is not arbitrarily disturbed to aid unscrupulous managers in their stock speculations. New lines are not built for speculative purposes, but for the development of the country. Rates are based more upon the cost of service than upon what the traffic will bear, and the ultimate object of the state's policy is not high profits, but a healthy growth of the country's commerce, while the sole aim of a private company is to get the largest revenue possible."

The weak points of Mr. Powers, of Vermont, and Mr. Grow, of Pennsylvania, are influenced through their extreme patriotism. Notwithstanding the conclusive evidence that the Government subsidy bonds and lands granted have paid for the entire building of the roads, and the proof showing that Stanford, Huntington, Crocker, and Hopkins, who at the time they built these roads at a cost of forty or fifty million dollars, were assessed for not to exceed a quarter of a million dollars, came out multimillionaires, among the richest men of the country, our friend from Pennsylvania, Mr. Grow, seems to regret that, in addition to the land grant large enough to make an empire and a subsidy of over $50,000,000 in bonds, they did not give them a bonus of $100,000,000 more in cash, and says that Congress would have readily done it had it been The weak points of Mr. Powers, of Vermont, and Mr. Grow, asked. Congress did give them in bonds and land more than suffi-cient to build the roads.

It will be remembered that the proof taken by the Wilson committee established substantially the following propositions:

First. That the Union Pacific Railroad, from Omaha to Ogden, was constructed under three contracts, known as the "Hoxie contract," the "Amer contract," and the "Davis contract."

Second. That through the intervention of assignments made by the holders of these contracts to trustees, and through the intervention of a constructed company known as the "Credit Mobilier of America," the profits derived from these contracts were secured to the officers and promoters of the Union Pacific Railroad itself. The persons who received these profits determined the amount thereof by their own votes.

Third. The result of these three contracts was as follows:

Cost to railroad company:

Ames contract Davis contract	$12,974,416.24 57,140,102.94 23,431,768.10
Total	93, 546, 287.29
Cost to contractors: $7,806,183.33 Hoxie contract 27,285,141.99 Davis contract 15,629,633.62	50, 720, 958, 94
The shift of the 12 has 22 at the second and the 25 has 25	42, 825, 328.34
To this should be added the amount paid Credit Mobilier on account of 58 miles	1, 104, 000.00
Total profit on construction	43, 929, 328. 34
Fourth. The actual cost of construction under these three c substantially equivalent to the proceeds of the first-mortgage company and of the Government bonds, as shown by the follow	bonds of the
First-mortgage bonds issued	$27,213,000.00 3,494,991.23
Net proceeds	23, 718, 008, 77
Government bonds issued	27, 236, 512, 00 91, 348, 72
Net proceeds	27, 145, 163. 28
Aggregate net proceeds of both classes	EO 000 100 OF
Cost of whole road to the contractors	50, 863, 172, 05 50, 720, 953, 94

Fifth. That the actual profits realized from the three contracts, after reducing the bonds issued to their cash value and charging the stock issued at 30 cents on the dollar, were $23,386,819.81. These profits are stated as follows:

Difference between proceeds of bonds and costs.

Ames and Davis contracts.

Bonds (cash value) Twenty-four million stock, at 30 Cash	$11,310,900,00 7,200,000.00 2,346,000.00
Total	20, 856, 900.00

(2) In 1873 the disclosures made by the examinations conducted by the Wilson committee excited much public attention and indignation with reference to similar practices affecting the Union Pacific Railroad Company through the intervention of the Credit Mobilier. Comparatively little attention was given by that committee to the affairs of the Central Pacific Railroad Company. Mr. Huntington, however, was examined as a witness. He was examined as to the profits resulting from the construction of the Central Pacific road. He described them as being confined to the stock of the company, and that the share received by him amounted to $1,00,000 of this stock. (See report of the Wilson committee, evidence of Huntington, page 703.) This evidence was given more than two years after the completion of the Central Pacific Railroad, and Mr. Stanford has testified that each of the parties in interest received $13,000,000 of the stock of the company as his share of the profits. (See evidence of Stanford, volume 5, pages 2855 and 2856.)

The report of the Wilson and Pattison Pacific Railroad Committees unite in these conclusions as the reasons for passing these railroad acts:

This act was not passed to further the personal interests of the corporators, nor for the advancement of commercial interests, nor for the convenience of the general public alone; but in addition to these, the interests, present and future, of the Government, as such, were to be subserved. A great highway was to be created, the use of which for postal, military, and other purposes was to be secured to the Government "at all times," but particularly in time of war. Your committee deem It important to call especial attention to this declared object of this act, to accomplish which object the munificent grant of lands and loan of the Government credit was made. To make such a highway and to have it ready at "all times," and "particularly in time of war," to meet the demands that might be made upon it; to be able to withstand the loss of business and other casualties incident to war and still to perform for the Government such reasonable service as might under such circumstances be demanded, required a strong solvent corporation, and when Congress expressed the object and granted the corporate powers to carry that object into execution, and aided the enterprise with subsidies of lands and bonds, the corporators in whom these powers were vested and under whose control these subsidies were placed were, in the opinion of your committee, under the highest moral, to say nothing of legal or equitable, obligations to use the atmost degree of good faith toward the Government in the exercise of the powers and disposition of the subsidies.

Our friends say the Government does not want to go into the transportation business. Why has the Government gone into the transportation business by keeping up the great Mississippi River and the Missouri River, and other great rivers of the country? It is that the country to the country may circulate cheaply from the interior of the country to the country to the country. the interior of the country to the coast lines. Why not take the Pacific railroad, a road built by the Government of the United States, a road that was never built by the Huntingtons, never built by the Hopkinses, except as agents of the Government of the United States, for the construction?

Now, if these roads are taken possession of by the Government, let them never pay off anything except the original bonds, and let every railroad in the United States that desires make reasonable traffic arrangements to run their trains over the track, just as they run their boats up and down the great Mississippi River. When that is done, Mr. Chairman, let the Government charge what is pages any to pay the running expenses only with a graph

When that is done, Mr. Chairman, let the Government charge what is necessary to pay the running expenses only, with a small precautionary sinking fund, and we will get a cheaper rate of transportation than we get now and a rate alike to all of the people. Now, there has never been any competition over this line, and I want to say that in this hearing before the Senate another combination has been shown. Mr. Huntington owns these great railroads and steamship line, and his company and others contracted with the Pacific Mail Steamship Line and bought every particle of room in those vessels, that there might be no competition between land and water transportation. I here append their agreement:

or room in those vessels, that there might be no competition between land and water transportation. I here append their agreement:

This agreement, between the Transcontinental Association, an association consisting of the following railroad companies, namely, the Southern Pacific Company; the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad Company; the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company; the California Central Railway Company; the California Southern Railroad Company; the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company; the Oregon Railway Company; the Denver and Rio Grande Western Railway Company; the Northern Pacific Railway Company; the Oregon Short Line Railway Company; the Union Pacific Railway Company; the Texas and Pacific Railway Company; the Oregon Short Line Railway Company; the Union Pacific Railway Company; the Texas and Port Worth Railroad, and the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway Company; the Chicago, Kansas and Nebraska Railway; Denver, Texas and Fort Worth Railroad, and the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, a corporation created by and existing under the laws of the State of New York, party of the first part, and the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, a corporation created by and existing under the laws of the State of New York, party of the first part, made and entered into this 1st day of October, 1888, witnesseth:

First. That the said party of the first part, in consideration of the undertakings and agreements of the said steamship company hereinafter contained, undertakes, promises, and agrees to and with said steamship company to grantnee, and does hereby guarantee, that the gross earnings upon through freight and passengers between New York and San Francisco to be provided to said steamship company by said party of the first part shall be $75,000 per month. All the gross earnings of said steamship company brosside to said steamship company.

Second. In consideration of said guaranty of said party of the first part shall be $75,000 per month. All the gross earnings of said steamship company a monthly average of 400 tons per vessel in case three steamers per month are run.

All above steamers to be first class and equal to those now maintained, and in case of the loss of a steamer or its withdrawal for any cause, the Pacific Mail Steamship Company shall as soon as possible furnish a steamer of equal capacity and rating. In the event of failure on the part of said steamship company to furnish proper and adequate facilities for the transportation of at least 1,200 tons of freight each way per month, at the rate of at least 400 tons per vessel, then the guaranty herein provided for shall be reduced prorate.

at least 1,200 tons of freight each way per month, at the rate of at least wotons per vessel, then the guaranty herein provided for shall be reduced prorata.

The steamship company is to bear and pay all the expenses and charges of every kind of transporting such goods, passengers, and freight from New York to San Francisco and from San Francisco to New York, including all charges and expenses of every kind in the ports of New York and San Francisco, and all supplies of passengers with food and sleeping accommodation, giving them proper accommodation according to class, and to continue to use all efforts to obtain first-class and other passengers as heretofore.

Third. The understanding and intention of this agreement is that the party of the first part shall, through agents appointed by itself, have entire and exclusive control of all the through business of the said steamship company between New York and San Francisco each way, and that no through freight or passengers shall be taken except at prices to be fixed by the party of the first part and by its consent, it being understood that said control shall be exercised through the established agencies of said steamship company. If the said steamship company shall have room or capacity for more than 600 tons, in the event of its running two steamers per month each way, of through freight on any steamer, and the party of the first part shall desire to fill it, the said party of the first part shall be at liberty to do so at rates fixed jointly by duly authorized representatives of the parties hereto, the party of the first part to half.

Fourth. The Pacific Mail Steamship Company shall render to the party of the first part to here half.

ness of each month on or before the 10th day of the succeeding month, showing the amount claimed to be due from the party of the first part under this agreement, and on or before the 30th day of the succeeding month the chairman of the party of the first part shall draw his draft in favor of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company upon each of the railroad companies constituting the party of the first part for the portion payable by it to said steamship company on account of the aggregate amount payable by the party of the first part to the said steamship company according to the foregoing provisions hereof. The portions of such aggregate amount payable from time to time by the respective companies forming the party of the first part shall be such as has been or may be fixed or prescribed among themselves; and each of the said companies forming the party of the first part shall be liable for the portion payable by the others or any other of such companies. Provided, nevertheless, that in the event of default in payment by any one or more of the companies constituting the party of the first part of its proportion herein provided for, it shall be optional with the party of the second part to terminate this agreement on giving ten days' notice to the party of the first part of the proportion herein provided for, it shall be optional with the party of the same, may, at any time, on demand, examine the books and accounts of the said steamship company for the purpose of obtaining full details as to freight and passengers transported by said steamship company under this agreement, and verifying the accounts and statements of the steamship company. Fifth, it is mutually understood and agreed that this contract shall be deemed to have commenced on the 1st day of October, 1889, and to include the earnings from through business on steamers sailing on and after that date, and as to each and all of the foregoing provisions shall continue in force thereafter until ninety days after written notice of the intention to terminate the

Attest:
Jos. Hellen, Secretary pro tem.

When these companies bought all the ship capacity of the Pacific Mail Steamship line, they had a monopoly and put the tariff at just what they desired, by land and by water. I want to say to our Eastern friends they have but little idea of what the people of the struggling West have stood and what they have to stand from the great Eastern corporations that come up and appeal to you for protection. You have but little idea of the combinations and the protection. You have but little idea of the combinations and the destruction that has stripped that country through the monopoly of railroads. I have seen in my own State, through the combinations of railroads, between two days, coal oil go from 55 cents to a few cents per gallon, and not an oil well at Florence, Colo., could operate a pump until the owners agreed to pump just so many barrels and sell it at such prices and within such range of territory as the Standard Oil trust determined; and it has stood that way for twenty years. We have seen manufacturing enterthat way for twenty years. We have seen manufacturing enter-prises strangled one after another through railroad combinations, discrimination, and rebates.

I want to say to you my friends here that when you talk of putting another mortgage on the road you simply put another burden upon the shoulders of the people of the West. When you say you will assume a mortgage that is on the branch lines of the road, amounting to millions of dollars, and add it to the present debts of the company, to be paid before our debt, you simply say to the people of the Pacific Coast you must pay that additional sum in freight rates. We should not be burdened with any further debt.

Great changes are taking place in railroad sentiment in this country because of their fostering the great trusts. It is conclusively shown by Mr. Larrabee, by Mr. Lloyd, by Mr. Brooks Adams, Mr. Stickney, and other noted economic writers that there must be a radical change in railroads, else the interior of the coun-must be a radical change in railroads, else the interior of the country where there is no competition will be stripped and impoverished and there will be a plethory of people in the cities at competitive points. They have reached the irresistible conclusion that there can be no competition between railroads where combi-mation is possible.

Mr. Stickney declares, as a lifelong railroad man, that while a railroad can deal with one great concern by giving it a drawback, and thereby secure the business, it is not going to deal with the smaller concerns.

Mr. Lloyd says the trusts, syndicates, and combinations are always made with the railroads behind them. "They hold back the riches of earth, sea, and sky from their fellows, who famish and freeze in the dark. They declare that there is too much light and warmthand food. They assert the right for their private profit to regulate the consumption by the people of the necessaries of life and to control production, not by the needs of humanity, but by the desires of a few for dividends. The coal syndicates think there is too much coal. There is too much iron, too much lumber, too much flour for this or that syndicate. The majority have never been able to buy enough of anything, but the minority have too much of everything to sell. Liberty produces wealth, and wealth destroys liberty."

Mr. Stickney, manager of the Great Western Railroad Company, said a short time ago, before the Interstate Commerce Committee:

You charge the Kansas and Nebraska farmer 13 cents to haul his grain 200 miles. You charge the grain dealer 6 cents to haul that same grain 400 miles to Chicago. I tell you, gentlemen, it is that kind of business that is making anarchists out of the farmers west of the Missouri River.

A newspaper adds:

Now, one never hears any complaint about the post-office monopoly selling postage stamps to the rich corporations for less than the farmer is asked, or of the New York World getting a lower rate of postage on its edition of many tons a day over the small country weekly with an issue of 25 pounds.

A few days ago there was a hearing in this city before the Inter-state Commerce Commission. The railroad people pleaded for a suspension of the long and short haul clause in the interstate-commerce law between Denver and the Pacific Coast. Two Colorado gentlemen took part in opposition of the suspension. I notice in one of my home papers, upon their return, that one of them received this notice from a shipper:

That Dave Day is not the only person in southern Colorado who kicks against being robbed by railroad corporations is attested by a few simple figures and just twenty-five words sent this office on Tuesday last from Rohde & Konig, butchers, of Rico. The memoranda on one of their monthly statements are in figures and words as follows:

77 sheep pelts, 18 cents each $13.86 Freight to Montrose 10.00

Net received for 77 sheep pelts.....

These pelts were shipped to Henry Cadwell, Montrose, Colo. What do you think of it?
Well, gentlemen, we think a d—n thief had considerable to do with the making out of the freight schedule, and that the thief, thus far, has the eternal cinch on the suckers.

The distance these pelts were shipped was 77 miles only

The distance these pelts were snipped was 77 miles only.

These things are the products of private ownership. These are the things our friends so much admire; but the final verdict of the people will be that rather than be owned by the railroad companies they will prefer to own and manage their own transportation.

Mr. POWERS. I yield now the balance of the hour to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Hepburn].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for fifty-seven minutes. Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that it would be well if we could strip this discussion of a good deal of the extra-neous matter and a great many of the improper considerations that have occupied the attention of gentlemen. We are not discussing have occupied the attention of gentlemen. We are not discussing a question of benefit to this man or that man or the other. It is a plain, open, business proposition of how the Government of the United States, finding itself a creditor, dealing in a large amount, with a bankrupt debtor—what course shall be pursued to secure some portion of that which is due to the Government. I confess at the outstart, Mr. Chairman, that I am not satisfied with the kill new predicts before the comparing. the bill now pending before the committee. It is not such and as I would prefer to have presented; but I believe it is the best proposition that is attainable. I would be glad if these debtors of ours could be compelled to pay every cent they owe to the United States, and do it quickly. I am not, like some gentlemen who are opposing this bill, in that condition of mind that I would suffer that it is a sea the debtors were able to reveal that great disappointment in case the debtors were able to pay all that they owe.

Mr. Chairman, in order to show to some extent the animus of some of the gentlemen who have argued against this bill, who are opposing this method of settlement, who have opposed every method of settlement, and will oppose all propositions looking to an adjustment that will leave these roads in the hands of the correction owners. I want to call attention to a frank and candid poration owners, I want to call attention to a frank and candid statement made by a great newspaper that has been already men-tioned in the course of this debate. One of the characteristics of that great paper is its frankness. It states without hesitation, without disguise, the actual proposition that it advocates.

me read briefly:

Mr. POWERS. What paper is it?

Mr. POWERS. What paper is it?
Mr. HEPBURN. I read from the Examiner, of San Francisco, of Friday morning, January 3, 1896, the leading article on the editorial page. Commenting upon an article on this subject in another paper, this editor says:

Our contemporary has put the cart before the horse. The people of this Coast are interested in the collection of the debt chiefly as a means of forcing the roads into the hands of the Government. If the hope of Government ownership were eliminated, they would take very little interest in the arrangements that might be made for the recovery of the money lent. Their interest in that point is precisely the same as that of every other section of the Union. As taxpayers, the people of California are no more directly concerned in the settlement of the debt than the people of Maine. The thing that roused a flame of hostility to all funding schemes in California, while Maine remained cool, was the hope that the debt might be made a lever to pry open the fetters that bound this Coast under the rule of an arrogant and greedy corporation.

If Mr. Huntington should pay his debts in full and keep his road we could not legally object, but the people of this Coast would be bitterly disappointed. If there should be a foreclosure sale and he should bid in the property for half the amount of his obligations the disappointment would be greater yet. We should have neither emancipation nor money. The only satisfactory outcome would be foreclosure, followed by purchase on Government account and operation for the public benefit. That is what the 200,000 signers of the Examiner's petition demanded. The whole scheme hangs together and can not be segregated. To prevent foreclosure from being an even greater sacrifice of the public interests than funding would be, it must be coupled with a provision for Government purchase. Without that provision, foreclosure would be simply another name for the gift of the roads to Huntington, free of incumbrance.

Mr. Chairman, that discloses the animus of much of the opposite

Mr. Chairman, that discloses the animus of much of the opposi-tion that this bill has encountered, and especially from members from California. Perhaps it is not necessary that I should remind gentlemen who were in the last Congress of the bitter assault that was made upon the proposition then presented from the Committee on Pacific Railroads. Yet that proposition was, in all of its substance, precisely like that which was made here yesterday by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Bell], and which received the plaudits of these gentlemen from California; but I undertake to say that if that proposition was the one pending, if that was the say that if that proposition was the one pending, if that was the measure before us here looking to securing the debt of the United States, every one of those acclaiming gentlemen of yesterday would be heard in the same bitter hostility to it that they manifested two years ago, and that they manifest to-day against the bill of the committee. They do not want any settlement that does not look to the ownership of this road by the Government, and its operation as a great highway upon which the owners of trains can compete with each other. They propose that we shall inaugurate the new but not untried experiment of Government ownership and operation of railroads. We have had experiences in that line. No less than seven of the States of this Union have, at different times, tried the burdensome and costly experiment, and in every instance the result has been loss to the public, disand in every instance the result has been loss to the public, dis-satisfaction on the part of the shippers, and emancipation from the business at great loss to the State.

The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Bell] tells us of the admira-The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Bell] tells us of the admirable manner in which this experiment is resulting in some of the European countries. I say that it has never been a success in any country as compared with proper management, or with the average management, of railways in the United States. In every instance it has been more expensive and less satisfactory. I have studied that phase of this question. I have read of the experiments that have been made, and, save in the two countries the gentleman names, it has been the effort of every nation in Europe to divorce itselffr om railroad business, and wherever the gove to divorce itselffr om railroad business, and wherever the governments have been able to do that, they have done it. The experiment generally has been a failure. In Belgium, with a dense population, with short roads having an immense traffic, the Government has been enabled to run its roads without loss, and there ernment has been enabled to run its roads without loss, and there are two roads in Hungary of which the same may be said; but, with those exceptions, neither the gentleman from Colorado nor any other gentleman in this House can point to a single instance where satisfactory results have been secured.

Mr. BELL of Colorado. How about France?

Mr. HEPBURN. France has abandoned the experiment in a great majority of instances, though there are still two or three roads in which the Government participates in ownership and in operation.

operation.

Mr. BELL of Colorado. They tried it only in sparsely settled portions of the country.

Mr. HEPBURN. At one time the Government either owned or operated nearly all of the roads in France, but they have abandoned it, or are abandoning it as rapidly as they can.

Mr. Chairman, there has been much of misstatement with regard to alleged propositions which have been laid before the Committee on the Pacific Railroads. I do not mean to say that anyon gard to alleged propositions which have been laid before the Committee on the Pacific Railroads. I do not mean to say that any of these misstatements are willful, but I do say that they misrepresent the actual facts. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Hubbard] declared that very much better propositions had been made to the committee than the one it has reported to the House, and there was something of a sneer in what he said to the effect that the committee, abandoning those that were better, had selected the worst of all that had been brought to its attention. I deny it worst of all that had been brought to its attention. I deny it. The gentleman spoke of the "better" proposition made by Mr. Pierce. That proposition was that the Union Pacific road should be authorized to place a mortgage of $100,000,000 upon the property, with which they would remove the now prior lien.

Of that one hundred millions of bonds the Government was to account thirty for million.

accept thirty-five millions. Its lien, mind you, not superior, but only equal to that of the other bondholders—in amount, $65,000,000. Then, for the balance of its debt, it was to accept stock or a 2 per cent bond, secured by a second mortgage. That was the so-called Pierce proposition. The gentleman from Missouri made his figures upon that as though each year there would certainly be a payment, as though the interest on the whole would be met, and as though the Government would be taking no risk in participating in this mortgage where there would be $65,000,000 of liens, at least equal to its own, which it might be compelled to advance in order to protect its own; and he assumes that is a better proposition than that of the bill. Again, the gentleman referred to what he called the Hubbard proposition. What was that? It was that the principal of the debt of the Government should be paid at the principal of the debt of the Government should be paid at once; the balance of the debt to be extended and paid with a 2 per cent income bond. That is, the bond would be paid if the company had the income. But, sir, the possibility of the company making good this proposition depended upon its ability to extend its first mortgage so as to enable them to borrow the money which would be paid to the Government.

How could we do that? Where is the authority? This Hubbard proposition was not made authoritatively. It was not made by proposition was not made authoritatively. It was not made by the Central Pacific Company. It was the idea of a single man who represented an estate that held some of the securities of one of the Central Pacific roads. No authoritative proposition of that kind has been made, and no man has the authority to say that it is within the limit of possibility. Yet the gentleman from Missouri, without that ingenuousness that ought to have charac-terized him, discussed this as a feasible business proposition, and terized him, discussed this as a feasible business proposition, and censured the committee for accepting the proposition they had advocated rather than the other. I thought this course was scarcely fair, and I would have been greatly astonished if it had not been for some other astonishing statements that the gentleman made. He told us that the Central Pacific Railroad had made a clear net profit in the building of its road of $52,000,000, and the Union Pacific a profit of $44,000,000 out of construction.

Mr. Chairman, the entire resources of the Central Pacific road were $27,000,000 in subsidy bonds and $27,000,000 in first-mortgage bonds. Remember, gentlemen, that those bonds were currency bonds. Gentlemen talk of the bountiful largess of the United States in passing the act of 1862 and the act of 1864. The act of 1862 provided for the subsidies and largely the land grant that subsequently came to the road; yet for more than two years those sequently came to the road; yet for more than two years those companies were absolutely powerless to move. We were in the companies were absolutely powerless to move. We were in the midst of a great war. Within sixty days after the passage of the second act the notes of the United States were sold in the market for 38 cents on the dollar. The Government did not give to these corporations dollars; it gave to them all it had; it gave them bonds-depreciated bonds.

Under the first act the provisional companies fruitlessly attempted to raise money. Congress at that time recognized the gigantic character of this enterprise; and in addition to the land grants, in addition to the subsidies, it authorized a stock subscription of $100,000,000. It was believed that the land grants and the subsidies and the stock would all be needed to build these roads.

Gentlemen will remember the differing conditions now and then—the difference in the cost of construction now and then. Now the construction of those roads would be a simple matter, with our knowledge of the geography and topography of that country.

All men know now that the road is feasible; then the fact was known only to the explorers and the few people who had crossed the thousands of miles of wilderness between the settlements upon the Mississippi River and the Pacific coast. Men could not be induced to engage in the enterprise. The law required that the stock books of the company be opened in all the principal cities of the United States for stock subscriptions. It limited the amount of stock that each single individual might take to inconsiderable sums. Yet with all the efforts that were made—the president of that provisional company was an honored citizen of my own State—we knew what was going on—we in Iowa were as much interested in this enterprise as any one of you people—we observed with solicitude and constant watchfulness what was being done we were compelled to note that the money of this country would not flow into this questionable enterprise

Then came the act of 1864. During those two years, be it remembered, no progress of any kind had been made; not a pound of iron had been secured—not a spike, not a spade had yet gone into the earth. Then Congress extended the land grant and authorized the issuance of bonds in amounts equal to the subsidies, which were to have the preference over the Government's mortgage. Yet, with that wonderful stimulus, it was a year and a half before any operations were begun on this side; and they were very meager ones in the valley of the Sacramento River, upon the other coast. Less than 20 miles had been built there—none at all here—up to the fall of 1865. After the close of the war the bonds had somewhat appreciated and were sold, the first ones at

Now, I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the serious error he made. The total amount of the receipts of the Central Pacific road from the sale of bonds at 70 cents—a few of them were sold at a higher price—was $39,200,000. Remember that in construction the land-grant mortgage was not available. Remember that there was scarcely a dollar of stock available, gentlemen tell us, that could have been sold; the enterprise was so questionable that the stock had no market value. Still the gentleman from Missouri, in his haste to bring some obloquy upon this proposition of the committee, makes the astounding statement that out of a possible $39,200,000 the Central Pacific Company, this ravenous and rapacious corporation, managed to gobble $62,-000,000. In the case of the Union Pacific road the sum available for its construction from sale of bonds at 70 cents was $46,200,000, for its construction from sale of bonds at 70 cents was $46,200,000, and it realized $44,000,000 of profit. It is by such statements as these that this question has been beclouded.

I do not know whether money was made out of this enterprise. I presume it was. I am not here to defend or to arraign those men who were engaged early in the enterprise. I know this, that if they made money out of this enterprise, it was because of the rise in the securities that they received. When they received the stock of those roads, it was valueless; no dividends had been the stock of those roads, it was valueless; no dividends had been paid, nor were any dividends made for years afterwards. Whatever there was of value in the stock came from the successful building of the road and the successful management afterwards. I only refer to this because I think gentlemen, whether their propositions are true or not, ought not to bring them here as make-weights against the proposition of the committee.

I am advised of this fact, that among all of the men connected with the Union Pacific road during its inceptive and constructive period there is not, so far as my knowledge goes, any one man to-day living who owns one of the securities of the road—that is to say. living who owns one of the securities of the road—that is to say, one of the security holders—who is trying to effect this arrangement. These men who are the present holders, at least of the Union Pacific securities, are not the men at whom these gentlemen have been leveling their lances. Those men have passed off the stage of life long, long ago. These men are, in large numbers, the foreign bondholders of the road, and are trying to save something for themselves; not the first-mortgage bondholders alone, but also some of the third-mortgage bondholders, and to some extent the stockholders, who recognize the fact that under a foreclosure all is lost to them.

is lost to them. Mr. Chairman, I desire this committee to look the facts that confront us squarely in the face. These two companies owe the United States, after appropriating every available dollar in their respective sinking funds, something more than $100,000,000. This debt is secured by a second mortgage on about 2,200 miles of trunk railroad, but the mortgage does not cover any of the terminals in Omaha, Kansas City, Denver, or San Francisco. Prior to the mortgage of the United States on these same miles of railroad there is a first mortgage, given to secure bonds amounting, with interest, to about $64,000,000. It is the opinion of the most competent experts that the mortgaged 2,200 miles of railroad is worth but little more than $64,000,000. At all events, before the Government can expect to realize anything on its debt by a foreclosure of its second mortgage, it must pay off the $64,000,000

Now, Mr. Chairman, there are three propositions, three courses that may be pursued by the Government in dealing with this question. I want to discuss them briefly.

First, that of allowing events to take their own course, and to be met under the legislation which we now have.

In order to protect itself, the Government finds that it must care for its own bonds and care for those bonds that have an overlying lien on the property. There are $61,000,000 and a little over of the first-mortgage bonds, about $64,000,000, with interest. Suppose that the Secretary of the Treasury appropriates all of the available funds now in the sinking fund of the two roads to meet the obligations to the Government. That will reduce the indebtedness to the Government of these roads several millions of dollars, perhaps as much as twenty millions. We will still have a debt, however, of $41,000,000 of principal and pearly $60,000,000 of several perhaps as much as twenty millions. We will still have a dept, now-ever, of $41,000,000 of principal and nearly $70,000,000 of accrued interest. We will have to pay off the first-mortgage bonds. There are $61,000,000—with interest $64,000,000—therefore, that the Government must advance before it can have any title to the road. After the Government has title to the road, the great bulk of its indebtedness is still unvaid because the roads are not worth one.

indebtedness is still unpaid, because the roads are not worth one-half of its debt and the first-mortgage bonds. Now, this is the actual situation: If the Government were to bid the amount of the first-mortgage bonds and the subsidy bonds, over $100,000,000 for the two roads, there would still be that great mass of interest that has been accumulating on $61,000,000 since 1868—more than $70,000,000. Do we want to do that? We are bound to be the loser. The property we will take will not be worth these two sums. It has been suggested by every man who worth these two sums. It has been suggested by every man who has spoken with anything like authority on this subject, save one—and he at one time agreed with all the balance—that these roads would not sell to-day for the amount of the first-mortgage bonds. I believe that they could be duplicated to-day for a sum equal to that amount. I have no doubt, in fact, about it. I have talked with many experts in railway construction, and I think it is the opinion of all men that these roads—that is, that portion of the roads on which the Government has a lien—could now be built for $25,000 a mile. I know there are many enterprising men in the United States who would be glad to take the contract at that snm.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if we would bid this colossal sum of which I have spoken, we should have a railroad on our hands worth at the most fifty or sixty millions of dollars.

Mr. LACEY. Does that include the rolling stock and other equipment?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think so, sir.

If true, we are losing the whole of the debt. It is all wiped out, because I assume that the Government would want to dispose of its railroad in some way. I do not believe that we would be ready to enter upon an experiment in railroad operation. Why, Mr. Chairman, just think what that would mean. Suppose this—the purchase of these roads at the foreclosure sale—to be that entering wedge that will find full lodgment in the policies of the United States Government. It must mean that beyond the officers and employees now serving the Government the list must be extended to the enormous number of 900,000 men beyond the number that find their names upon the Blue Book—and 150,000 names are found upon the Blue Book at the present time—for all of the employees and servants of railroad companies in the United States will be come officers of the Government when it takes upon itself the ownership and operation of all the railroads, and there are 900,000 persons now employed by the railroads in the United States. There are prophets of the future who have told us that the great peril to our institutions lies in the fact of the great number of officers we have—150,000—giving added interest to the quadrennial elections; that this is a constant menace and a constant peril. As an adjunct to this control of railroads we must have the telegraph. There are 100,000 more officers to be added. In other words, we are to extend the Blue Book to six and one-half times its present limit. Are we ready for that? Do gentlemen want to do that? And yet that is what is involved in this proposition of Government ownership and Government control of railroads.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. HEPBURN. For what purpose?
Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. For the purpose of asking a queson. I understand you to say that—
Mr. HEPBURN. Well, will the gentleman come to his ques-

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Do you assert that this question of Government ownership of these railroads in the United States is involved in the foreclosure of the Government lien on these roads?

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not. I did not say so. If the gentleman had paid me the compliment to listen at the proper time, he would have known that I did not say that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I heard you discussing that.

Mr. HEPBURN. I said this was the entering wedge, and that the advocates of it were so persistent now because they recognized the fact that it was an entering wedge—that it is the begin-of what they desire.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will you answer one more question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, I should prefer not to be interrupted. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield. Mr. HEPBURN. Ask the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Bell], does he believe that this is the entering wedge? Does he not does he believe that this is the entering wedger. Does he had believe that it will be followed on and on, no matter at what expense, until every mile of railway in the United States is under the control and operation of the United States Government? Look at every platform, repeated over and over again as the years go by. If there is any one thing above all others that that somewhat whimsical Populist party is addicted to, it is to this proposition of railway ownership by the Government. Each year proposition of railway ownership by the Government. Each year it changes, in part, "the fundamental and eternal" principles that underlie its organization, but never this. It is always consistent in insisting that railway ownership and operation by the Government are essential to the happiness and prosperity of the American people. Ownership and operation by the Government of the Pacific roads is what the gentlemen from California desire. It is because of that desire they fight the pending bill. It is for such ownership that the Examiner article that I read contends. I do not believe that we are ready to go into that approximate

I do not believe that we are ready to go into that experiment. And yet, whatever the Populist party may mean, we know that all of the indebtedness due now from these corporations. only that, but it means the expenditure of $61,000,000, which, with delinquent interest, amounts to about $64,000,000, or nearly that, that we shall have to pay before we shall have the title. Then comes the question, If we do not desire to continue the owner-

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question of fact right there? Do I understand him to say that if there is no legislation under existing law, with foreclosure, the Government would have to pay off, without any further legislation, say $64,000,000 of the first lien?

Mr. HEPBURN. I am not positive that the Secretary of the Treasury could pay that off without legislation. I am not prepared to say whether these payments could be made to that extent. The sinking fund, however, could certainly be used for that purpose.

Mr. POWERS. The act of 1887 expressly provides that the Sec-

mr. Fow Ens. The act of 1997 expressive provides that the storest provides the storest provides the storest provides that the storest provides the st Treasury to redeem from the first mortgage. Now, another question. The road is to be sold under that act of 1887. Am I correct about that?

Mr. POWERS. Under the act of 1887.
Mr. CANNON. For what it will bring?
Mr. POWERS. The process of foreclosure in the Federal courts always results in a sale. That is the proper Federal procedure.

Mr. CANNON. To sell for what it will bring.
Mr. POWERS. To sell for what it will bring, to the highest bidder.

Mr. CANNON. Now, has the gentleman any information that if that decree were entered to-day, and this sale advertised, the road would bring any more than the $64,000,000 that the Government would have to advance, or less?

Mr. HEPBURN. All the information that we have is to the effect that the roads could not sell for more than the subsidy bonds. Only one gentleman has ever said, so far as my knowledge goes, anything to the contrary, and he said the same in a formal report that he made to the President. Afterwards he changed his opinion, and thought perhaps it would sell for 50 per cent of the principal, in addition to the amount of the first-mortgage bonds. But that was simply a conjecture. He did not assume to have any information upon the subject.

Now, gentlemen, that is the situation. We would then, instead of having a loss of our debt, have a new expenditure by the Govof having a loss of our debt, have a new expenditure by the Government of the United States amounting to nearly $64,000,000, and we would have no compensation for that and no justification of our act to our constituents. Now the Government has invested in the roads more than $100,000,000. Then it would have invested in the roads more than $164,000,000. We would have a railroad without terminals on our hands, that we could build or replace for less then the roads. for less than the money-this $64,000,000-that we would have to

Now, that is a business proposition, and that is the one that stares the members of this House in the face now. Gentlemen say that they think that the railroad companies, the corporations, ought to do something better than this; that we ought to have a better proposition than this. The Committee on the Pacific Roads better proposition than this. The Committee on the Pacific Roads in the last Congress brought in a proposition. The companies said they could not comply with its terms, but some of the Committee on Pacific Roads then believed they could. It provided that the subsidy bonds should be paid off, and that we would extend the interest for a series of years at 3 per cent.

Mr. POWERS. If the gentleman will pardon me to interrupt him, it provided that the first-mortgage debt should be paid off, not the subsidy bonds.

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, you will notice how these gentlemen assailed that proposition. They insisted then that that was not a security. Mind you, it removed everything that lay above the lien of the United States; everything superior to it; and we would have a first lien upon every mile of the aided roads. They told us that that was not sufficient security. And these gentlemen us that that was not sufficient security. And these gentlemen that are now opposing this measure attacked that with the same vehemence that they do the present proposition. Then they were disposed to deny the ulterior or underlying purposes that animate I do not believe that we are ready to go into that experiment. And yet, whatever the Populist party may mean, we know that the gentlemen from California mean that; for here, without disguise, they tell us that the payment of the debt, the doing of all that the Government is interested in, the complete wiping out of the relation of creditor and debtor between these corporations and the United States—that if that could be accomplished by laying down the money in the Treasury, the people of California States. Do you believe that if the exactions were so during the United States. Do you believe that if the exactions were so during the United States. Do you believe that if the exactions were so during the United States. Do you believe that if the exactions were so during the United States. Do you believe that if the exactions were so during the United States. Do you believe that if the exactions were so during the United States. Do you believe that if the exactions were so during the United States. Do you believe that if the exactions were so during the United States. Do you believe that if the exactions were so during the United States. Do you believe that if the exactions were so during the United States. Do you believe that if the exactions were so during the United States. Do you believe that if the exactions were so during the United States. Do you believe that if the exactions were so during the United States. Do you believe that if the exactions were so during the United States. Do you believe that if the exactions were so during the United States. Do you believe that if the exactions were so during the United States. Do you believe that if the exactions were so during the United States. Do you believe that if the exactions were so during the United States. Do you believe that if the exactions were so during the United States. Do you believe that if the exactions were so during the United States. Do you believe that if the exactions were so during the United States. Do you believe that it was all the United S content themselves with whîmpering to Congress? Not a bit of it. They would parallel the Central Pacific road and have competition in their traffic.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield to me? I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa if it did not appear before the committee that the freight rates and the passenger rates of the State of California were to-day, under the load of this octopus, lower than they are in New England?

Mr. MORSE. I know that is so from personal knowledge of Mr. MORSE. I know that is so from personal knowledge of shipment of freight to San Francisco.

Mr. HEPBURN. I believe that is so.

Mr. POWERS. Did it not appear that the regulation of the freight rates in the State of California is under a board of railroad commissioners elected by the people of that State?

Mr. HEPBURN. That appeared. There is no question about

Mr. LACEY. Will my colleague yield for a correction of a

Mr. LACEY. Will my colleague yield for a correction of a statement made by the gentleman from Vermont as to the compulsory payment of the debt? I find on an examination of the statute it is optional with the President to order the payment.

Mr. HEPBURN. Very well. Undoubtedly the President of the United States would do that. He certainly would not seize upon this property and hold it, relying upon the fact that the owners of the first-mortgage bonds could not sue the United States, had no compulsory process against the United States, and no power to compel them to do right and justice. I take it that he would make that payment just as certainly as though the statutes said he should do that.

Mr. Chairman, we have one other proposition, and that is to do

Mr. Chairman, we have one other proposition, and that is to do nothing. We could sit here quietly; we could instruct the Secretary to do nothing in this behalf, and allow the first-mortgage bondtary to do nothing in this behalf, and allow the first-mortgage bondholders to proceed. Who would probably be the bidders? Certainly it would be those persons who have an interest other than that of the mere shippers. Who are those? Those persons who hold the securities of the railroad—the first-mortgage bondholders. They would be the active ones who would move in this enterprise, and if the present company were content to stand out of the way and let them have the roads they would probably take them by securing that lien, which would give them title. We are confident, however, that no bidder would appear who would offer the amount of the principal of the Government debt and the first-mortgage bonds. the principal of the Government debt and the first-mortgage bonds. Remember that those aggregate now $126,000,000, less the sum that is in the sinking fund, something like $20,000,000. They aggregate at least $106,000,000, but the Government would probably apply the sinking fund to the payment of the interest, in which case the two debts—without interest—would be more than $126,000,000.

Now, is it probable that any bidder can be found within the length and breadth of the United States or elsewhere who would length and breadth of the United States or elsewhere who would pay $126,000,000 for these roads, more than $50,000 a mile, when there are men standing ready to-day to duplicate the roads for half that sum per mile? Gentlemen seem to think that there is nothing in the fact that we do not own or have a lien upon the terminals. I presume that some kind of an arrangement could be terminals. I presume that some kind of an arrangement could be made. I recognize the fact that in some instances the terminals are not of great advantage without connection with the Union or the Central Pacific road, but there are certain other cases where participation in the business of the terminals would not be a matter of trifling importance. At all events, the right to use them could only result from purchase, and the fact of the necessity of paying for that right would, to that extent, diminish the value of the roads to the purchaser under foreclosure proceedings. So that it is a matter of importance from any point of view.

Now Mr. Chairman, as I have said, for my part this proposithat it is a matter of importance from any point of view.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I have said, for my part this proposition is not just what I would desire. I undertake to say that no member of the committee is entirely satisfied with it. We would have been better pleased if we could have secured larger annual payments and shorter time, but we present it to you as the best and most feasible settlement that we believe to be attainable. We have no hope of anything better, and from the estimate I have been able to make of the probable earnings of these roads, that is all that can be got from them, and that a demand for larger sums would simply mean continued and renewed periods of bankruptcy. would simply mean continued and renewed periods of bankruptcy, when "the roads would be operated, to their great advantage," according to my friend from Colorado [Mr. Shafroth], by a reaccording to my friend from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], by a receiver. According to my friend's theory, a corporation is always better off the nearer it approaches to absolute poverty and bankruptcy. When it becomes utterly unable to meet its obligations and falls into the hands of a receiver, an officer of the United States, presto, it is at once rejuvenated, its condition is immediately bettered, and the results—he did not say the results to the stockholders and bondholders, however—are immensely improved. [Langhter] What a boom the gentleman's advice will be to all stockholders and bondholders, however—are immensely improved.

[Laughter.] What a boon the gentleman's advice will be to all struggling corporations in this country, the officers of some of which are lying awake nights in fear of the losses and the ignominies that will result from the strong hand of the United States being placed upon their properties and those properties being operated without their experience, their aid, their consent.

I admit, Mr. Chairman, that we do not get by this bill that perfect security which I wish we could get; but this proposition gives fect security which I wish we could get; but this proposition gives us better security than we have now. I have no hesitation in affirming that we increase the security, even in the case of the Union Pacific Company, and we largely increase the security in the case of the Central Pacific, notwithstanding the fact that in both instances we authorize an increase in the first mortgage. Gentlemen belittle the security that is to be given to the Government in the cooperation of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company in the payment of the debt of the Central. In the first place, Mr. Chairman, there is the donation of $2,500,000 belonging to the Southern Pacific road, which comes in as a first payment. That certainly seems to indicate good faith. That is the first step to be taken. Then we have the guaranty of the Southern Pacific Company. I do not know just what it is worth, but I know that Poor says, in his last Railroad Manual, that the assets of the company are worth $189,000,000, and it seems to me that the indorsement are worth $189,000,000, and it seems to me that the indorsement of that kind of a guarantor is worth something. I do not know what value the Southern Pacific Company sets upon its lease of the Central, but I suppose they regard it as valuable. I assume that they desire its continuation. I assume that they know or believe that it will be lost if they should fail in their guaranty, and I believe that no other condition than that of impossibility will prevent the meeting of all the obligations of that guaranty.

Now, gentlemen, this House can of course refuse to accept this measure. We can turn the question over to another Congress.

We can turn the question over to another Congress. We another hearing. We can gather more literature on this measure. We can turn the question of the can have another hearing. We can gather more literature on this subject. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Hubbard] complains that there were not facts enough brought out for him. Why, Mr. Chairman, there are volumes of facts bearing upon this subject. that would have answered every question that seems to agitate the gentleman's mind had he seen fit to examine and investigate them. The gentleman seems to think, however, that testimony which is not adduced before himself fails to convince, and he has refused to look to the testimony heretofore given, setting forth facts no more pertinent when they were narrated than they are now. The gentleman claims that there are no proofs such as would operate on his mind. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the committee will rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration House bill No. 8189 and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following Senate bills were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A bill (S. 3035) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth Gnash—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (S. 2338) for the relief of Joshua Bishop—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 811) to provide a district attorney and a marshal for the western judicial district of the State of South Carolina—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. 470) granting to the State of Washington certain lands therein situated for the purpose of a fish hatchery—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to ask permission of the House that the session be extended until he can present one or two messages from the President of the United States. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

SLAUGHTER OF CATTLE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message of the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, in response to the resolution of the House of Representatives of May 8, 1896, requesting information as to what had been done by the Department of State to carry out the provision in the act of March 2, 1895, making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the year 1896, as to negotiations with Great Britain to secure the abrogation or modification of the regulations requiring the slaughter of cattle from the United States at the port of entry, a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, January 8, 1897.

OFFICIAL FORCE OF STATE DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message of the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith the report of the Secretary of State in response to the resolution of the House of Representatives of June 5, 1896, calling for information concerning the changes made in the force of his Department since the 4th day of March, 1896.

This report has been in my hands since the 9th day of December, 1896, and its transmission to the House of Representatives has been delayed by my inadvertence.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, January 8, 1897.

The SPEAKER (at 5 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.). In accordance with the rule of the House, the House now stands in recess until 8 o'clock this evening for the pension session, when the gentleman from New York, Mr. PAYNE, will please act as Speaker.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House at 8 o'clock p. m. resumed its session and was called to order by Mr. PAYNE as Speaker pro tempore.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report clause 2 of Rule XXVI.

The Clerk read as follows:

The House shall on each Friday at 5 o'clock p.m. take a recess until 8 o'clock, at which evening session private pension bills, bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills removing charges of desertion only shall be considered, said evening session not to extend beyond 10 o'clock and 30

Mr. THOMAS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar under Rule XXVI.

Mr. ERDMAN. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. ERDMAN. The point of order is that the special order under which the House is now acting provides for the discussion at this time of the Pacific Railroad bill under the five-minute rule, and does not permit our going into Committee of the Whole for pension business, as indicated in the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Thomas]. I will read the special rule:

That the said bill—the Pacific Railroad funding bill—shall be considered under the rules governing general debate during the said day and the day following until the hour of 5 o'clock p. m., at which time general debate shall close, and then said bill shall be open to amendment and consideration—

Mr. ARNOLD of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman read a

Mr. ERDMAN (continuing the reading)- under the five-minute rule until 5 p. m. the following day, at which time the committee shall rise, etc.

Now, that was the special order which abrogated the standing order of business making Friday private bill day. I have an amendment which I propose to offer to the Pacific Railroad bill. That business is in order now, not the consideration of pension

That business is in order now, not the consideration of pension business. There was no reservation anywhere in the special order saying that this evening should be devoted to pensions. The special rule abrogates the general rule; and therefore the motion of the gentleman from Michigan is not in order.

Mr. LACEY. I suggest that the point of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ERDMAN], even if it were well taken, comes too late. At 5 o'clock this afternoon the question arose as to the recess under the general rules of the House until 8 o'clock for the consideration of private pension business. The House took that recess. If the objection that the gentleman now urges was good, it should have been made at that time. It is too late to make the point after the House has taken the recess and has reconvened under the rule, because the House has already conclusively acted under the rule, because the House has already conclusively acted upon the matter.

Mr. ERDMAN. I will ask the gentleman how the point of order could have been raised at that time?

Mr. LACEY. Just as you raise it now.
Mr. ERDMAN. No, sir; this is raised on a motion.
Mr. LACEY. When the Speaker made his announcement, the gentleman could have suggested that the recess could not be taken under the general rule, because that rule had been suspended by the special rule under which the House was acting. That was the time to make the spirit if at all. It is to letter.

Mr. THOMAS. If anything could be assumed from the special order with respect to the Pacific Railroad bill, the fact that the time for the closing of general debate was fixed at 5 o'clock to-day, with a provision that amendments should then be offered until o'clock to-morrow, would justify the assumption that the special order was not intended to override the session of this evening under Rule XXVI, which has been read by the Clerk. With that suggestion, I am willing to leave the question for the decision of

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Whether the special order adopted by the House is in conflict with clause 2 of Rule XXVI may The SPEAKER pro tempore. be a question; but in the opinion of the Chair the point of order if good, should have been raised at 5 o'clock. The House could not be declared in recess by the Speaker from 5 o'clock until 8 except under clause 2 of Rule XXVI. When that announcement was made by the Speaker, it was in the power of any member to raise the point of order; and it should have been raised then, if ever; because, had not the House been declared in recess until this time by the Speaker under the rule, it would have continued in session until a motion to adjourn or to take a recess had been made. Speaker having determined at that time that clause 2 of Rule XXVI was in operation with respect to this evening's business, a point of order now comes too late. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania appeals; and the question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ERDMAN) there were—ayes 56, noes 1.

Mr. ERDMAN. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently no quorum is present.

Mr. THOMAS. I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

Mr. THOMAS. I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The following members subsequently reported "present" under the rule:

Mr. CHICKERING, Mr. DINSMORE, Mr. DE ARMOND, Mr. GIL-LET of New York, Mr. Pugh, Mr. Snover, Mr. Sparkman, Mr. Sorg, Mr. Tate, and Mr. Wilson of New York. During the call the following proceedings took place: Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I think it is evident that we will not be able to get a quorum to-night within the time that the

ession can continue under the rule. I therefore move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 19, noes 39.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask that my colleague, Mr. Les-Ter, be excused from attendance to-night on account of sickness.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Brosius, is absent on account of illness, and I ask that he be excused.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One hundred and twelve members are present, as shown by the roll call.

Mr. THOMAS, Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody and bring to the bar of the House such of its members as are now absent without the leave of the House.

The question was taken on the adoption of the resolution; and on a division there were—ayes 55, noes 32. So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 33, noes 50.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. HENDRICK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to put upon its passage at this time a bill to pension a blind woman, the widow of a soldier.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No quorum b Chair can not entertain the gentleman's request. No quorum being present, the

Mr. SHERMAN. If in order, I will move to take a recess until ence of a quorum.

12 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion would not be in order without a quorum.

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The question was taken; and on a division there were-ayes 45, noes 48.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. HOOKER and Mr. BOWERS moved that the House ad-

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I want to know if it would be in order to submit a few remarks on the general perversity and cussedness of human nature in gen-on the general perversity and classedness of infinial nature in general and of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Erdman] in particular? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that in the judgment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HARDY] that is not in order, and the Chair is of the same opinion. [Laughter.]

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. Cooke of Illinois and Mr.

THOMAS), there were—ayes 40, noes 52.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask for tellers. Tellers were refused, 34 members, not a sufficient number, voting in favor thereof. Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I understood a parliamentary inquiry was submitted to the Chair a few moments ago, and we have not yet heard the decision of the Chair

Dayton, Dingley,

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. THOMAS. If it is not out of order, I wish to inquire if the warrants for the arrest of absent members are in the hands of the Sergeant-at-Arms?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I should like to know what proceedings have been taken by the Sergeant-at-Arms in pursuance of the resolution that was passed by this House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms has not yet reported.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Well, then, I rise to another parliamentary inquiry, and that is, What proceedings can we take to ascertain what proceedings have been taken by the Sergeant-at-Arms under the resolution?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that is hardly a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair will state, for the information of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FAIRCHILD], that it took some time for the Clerk to copy the names, to make out the warrants, and they have not been in the hands of the Sergeant-at-Arms for a great length of time, and that is probably the reason why no report has been made.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. One more question. Have the warrants been signed by the Speaker yet?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The warrants have been signed by the Speaker.

Mr. BOWERS. If I may be permitted at this time—

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for leave of absence on account of sickness.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks that he be excused from further attendance on account of sickness. Is there objection?

Several Members. I object.
Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, many members have been coming in since the order for the call of the House. Has a record been kept so as to know the number now present?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed from the Clerk's desk that 118 members are present.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, it would seem to me the number present is greater than that. There may possibly be an error, and I am inclined to insist that there is a quorum.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. JENKINS. Division!

Mr. McCULLOCH. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Twelve gentlemen have risen—not a sufficient number; the yeas and nays are refused. The noes have it, and the motion is rejected.

Mr. IACEY. I move that we take a recess until twenty-nine minutes after 10 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not in order. Mr. LACEY. Then I move that the House do now adjourn. The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. THOMAS (at the end of the call). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to interrupt the roll call for the purpose of offering a resolution. The SPEAKER protempore. The roll call has been completed, but the vote has not yet been announced.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to offer the resolution before the vote is announced.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in order until after the announcement of the vote.

Mr. THOMAS. Not by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not by unanimous consent. There is not a quorum present. On this question the yeas are 52 and the nays are 61. The nays have it, and the motion to adjourn is lost.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker be requested to ascertain and report to the House what progress, if any, has been made by the Sergeant-at-Arms, or his deputies, in arresting absent members.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the motion is in order, but would suggest that the inquiry be made directly of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. THOMAS. I have offered the resolution in good faith, for the purpose of ascertaining how efficient the officers of the House are, as nearly two hours have elapsed since this call began.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the resolution by striking out "Speaker" and inserting "Sergeant-at-Arms."

Mr. THOMAS. I do not accept that amendment, Mr. Speaker,

Mr. THOMAS. I do not accept that amendment, Mr. Speaker, for the reason that I suppose the Sergeant-at-Arms is now engaged in the active discharge of his duty under the order of the House. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out the word "Speaker;" so that the resolution will read: "Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be requested," etc.

Mr. TRACEY. I move to amend the amendment by inserting, after the word "report," the word "immediately." The amendment was adopted.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by striking out the word "requested" and inserting "directed."

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. Baker of New Hampshire, the Speaker pro tempore declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CHICKERING. I ask for a division.

On a division the amendment was adopted-ayes 45, noes 4. The resolution as amended was adopted in this form:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to report immediately to the House what progress, if any, has been made by him or his deputies in arresting absent members.

The Sergeant-at-Arms, accompanied by three members, appeared at the bar of the House and reported as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Sergeant-at-Arms begs leave to report that, in compliance with the order of the House, sundry warrants have been issued for the arrest of absent members. Some of them are now in process of execution, and in the meantime the Sergeant-at-Arms has the honor to report the presence of Mr. STALLINGS, Mr. WOODARD, and Mr. KLEBERG, who have been arrested by order of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. STALLINGS, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. STALLINGS. I have not been well for some time, Mr.

Speaker, and therefore I did not come out to-night.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to-ayes 75, noes 0; and Mr. Stallings was excused.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. WOODARD, you have been absent from the House during its session without leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. WOODARD. I regret to say, Mr. Speaker, that I have not so good an excuse as that of the gentleman from Alabama. Indeed, I have none. I did not suppose that my presence would be needed this evening, but I came as soon as I learned that there was no quorum.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.
Mr. BAKER of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Can the House excuse a member when it finds itself without a quorum?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House has a right to do anything in the matter of procuring the attendance of a quorum, and this is a step in that direction. The gentleman is excused.

Mr. KLEBERG, you have been absent from the House during its session. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. KLEBERG. I was behind with my correspondence on account of sickness, and I did not think my presence would be required this evening. I have been present on every other occasion, and I hope the House will excuse me.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, is debate in order?

Mr. SMITH of Hilliols. Mr. Speaker, is debate in order.

[Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to say anything in the way of levity, but to say that since, under the rules of the House, we have Friday night sessions for special business, it does seem to me that every member who has the interest of his constituents at heart ought to be present to aid in the transaction of the business of these sessions the same as at any other time constituents at heart ought to be present to aid in the transaction of the business of these sessions the same as at any other time during the sitting of Congress. Now, I know, Mr. Speaker.—

Mr. HICKS. I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. What is the question pending before the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to excuse the gentleman from Texas for his absence.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I know, Mr. Speaker, that there are many members who, during the eight years I have served in Congress, have never absented themselves during Friday night sessions and who never absent themselves during the day sessions of Congress. I consider attendance on the one just as important as the other. And sometimes I think that such a great body of Representatives of this country of ours ought to take into consideraresentatives of this country of ours ought to take into consideration the seriousness of all our legislative deliberations and of all the sessions of this House. I know that during the time I have served here there have been scores of members who have never been seen on this floor at Friday night sessions. Yet we have a Committee on Pensions, a Committee on Invalid Pensions, and a Committee on Fensions, a committee on Invand Fensions, and a Committee on Military Affairs, the reports of which are all to be considered at our Friday night sessions. And I believe that every member ought to attend and assist in disposing of the business which those committees have presented to this House.

No man on this floor, however, is more willing than myself to excuse any brother member for nonattendance, if he has a reason-able excuse. There is none of us who has not plenty of work; able excuse. none of us who has not more work than any single member can do; none of us who does not need a clerk, and most of us need at least two, besides doing all the work we can ourselves.

I do not consider that matters of this character ought to be treated as schoolboys' pranks in school. We ought to sit here as business men and attend to the business we are elected to attend to and agricustly consider the interests of our continuous consideration. to, and seriously consider the interests of our constituents in every

I am more than willing that our colleague shall be excused tonight. I simply wanted to enter my protest against absenteeism from Friday night sessions by those who ought to be here assisting in performing the duties of this House. There are no questions coming up for consideration of more vital importance to individuals than the bills that are brought up for consideration at Friday night sessions. They are bills to relieve those who are supposed to be worthy individuals whose cases are not covered by the general law, and who have not received and can not receive under the general law the relief which they seek. We are not supresed to be here at our Friday night sessions as a body doling out by the general law, and who have not received and can not receive under the general law the relief which they seek. We are not supposed to be here at our Friday night sessions as a body doling out charity. We are supposed to consider carefully cases not covered by the general law, and as men of intelligence, as men of patriotism, and as American citizens, to deal out justice to those who are entitled to it under such circumstances. [Applause.]

I am willing on any occasion to spend the time from 8 o'clock on Friday night of each week until half past 10 in helping the old soldier who has sustained this country, made it what it is, carried his flag, "the Stars and Stripes," through the valleys, over the mountains and the hills, and who under the general law can not obtain the relief which he deserves. I am willing also to sit during the same time to aid his widow whose case is not covered by the general law, and his orphans who are in the same situation. the general law, and his orphans who are in the same situation.

[Applause.]
But during the eight years I have been here there have been many members who carried their muskets and marched under the flag, members who carried their muskets and marched under the flag, and who, session after session, have taken pride in making long speeches for home consumption in favor of the old soldier—too many of such men I have known have never been present on Friday nights to help an old soldier, his widow, or his orphan needing assistance. [Applause.]

As I have said, I am willing to vote and shall vote to excuse our colleague to-night; but I do hope that during the remainder of this session Representatives on this floor, whether on the one side or the other of this House, will rise equal to the occasion and exhibit their patriotism, their love of country, their love for the old soldier—especially if they themselves have marched under the same flag—by being here to aid him when the services of a mem same flag-by being here to aid him when the services of a member of Congress are necessary. [Applause.]

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, in support of the motion that I have made to excuse the gentleman from Texas, I wish to say that the excuse offered by him presents a case very natural to any of us; and I hope the motion will prevail.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. Thomas, it was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas is Mr. THOMAS. Inffer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the order directing the Sergeant-at-Arms to take into custody and bring to the bar absent members be made returnable to-morrow (Saturday) morning, after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Does not the pending special order concerning the consideration of the Pacific Railroad funding bill preclude any matter of this kind?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that it would, and that the resolution of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. THOMAS] is out of order.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to be heard on that question.

I should like to be heard on that question. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentle-

Mr. THOMAS. I will modify my resolution by fixing Monday or Tuesday instead of to-morrow, if that will obviate the objection of the Speaker.

Several Members. Do not modify the resolution. Mr. THOMAS. I read from the Manual, page 300:

The House may, however, by resolution continue in force beyond an adjournment the order that the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody and bring to the bar absent members, and may make such order returnable on a day subsequent to the day of adjournment.

I ask the Chair whether the resolution which I present is not a matter of the highest privilege—above all other orders, even the special order under which the House has been acting?

Mr. WANGER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. THOMAS. I insist on the pending resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Wanger] moves that the House do now adjourn, which motion takes precedence.

The question was taken; and on a division there were ayes 12, noes 66.

So the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolu-tion as modified by the gentleman from Michigan.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the order directing the Sergeant-at-Arms to take into custody and bring to the bar absent members be made returnable on Tuesday morning next, after the reading of the Journal.

I wish to submit for the consideration of the Chair that the Friday night session is held under a special order of the House, which prescribes that it shall consider certain business on the Private Calendar only; that because of that it has jurisdiction of no other matter, and has not the jurisdiction to prescribe or make a special order for the House at any other

Mr. THOMAS. The gentleman is wrong in that, because we are not now in Committee of the Whole. The House is in session, and we are acting under an order for a call of the House. No business is in order under that call except that which pertains to it, and no motion except with reference to the call or a motion to adjourn could be considered as in order now. The motion that I have made has direct reference to the call of the House now progressing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read clause 2 of Rule XXVI.

The Clerk read as follows:

The House shall on each Friday at 5 o'clock p. m. take a recess until 8 o'clock p. m., at which evening session private pension bills, bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills for removing charges of desertion only shall be considered, said evening session not to extend beyond 10 o'clock and 30 min-

Mr. LACEY. I would like to suggest that the right of the House to have a quorum on Friday night is just as sacred as it is on Monday, or at any other time in the week; and the same power to secure and preserve a quorum on Friday night necessarily inheres in the House as well as at any other session which they hold.

Mr. GARDNER. That is a fact that nobody disputes. The Friday night session has the same power to take the same means to get a quorum as any other session of the House; but the prescribing of the return of the warrant as the special order of the House for some other time than the Friday night session is not necessarily a part of the power for getting a quorum, and does not pertain to the power of the House at all under the rule for the Friday night sessions. On the contrary, the resolution providing for the return of the warrants on Tuesday next is in direct conflict with the attempt to get a quorum to-night.

Mr. THOMAS. But the rule provides that the return can be put off to some other date, and this is the session of the House this evening just as well as it was this afternoon when the House was considering the other matter.

Mr. GARDNER. But limited to a special order only.
Mr. THOMAS. Not limited for this purpose.
Mr. WANGER. I suggest to the gentleman from Michigan that he address his remarks to the Chair, and not to the gentleman from New Jersey. [Laughter.]
The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is a point of order already pending.

Mr. THOMAS. Let us have a ruling.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the motion of the gentleman from Michigan is in order. This is a proceeding to compel the attendance of members at this session of the House. It is the prerogative of the House, when the members are brought in, either to excuse or to punish them as the House may see fit, and this resolution provides that the return of the warrants for the arrest of absent members shall be made at some future day to the House, namely, next Tuesday.

the House, namely, next Tuesday.

The Chair thinks under the rule that the House has the power to compel a quorum at these Friday night sessions, and has the power also to provide for the return of the warrant at such time as it shall determine at this session.

The question, therefore, is on the motion presented by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry. What will be the effect if the Sergeant-at-Arms should bring in other members to-night? Will the adoption of this resolution discharge the Sergeant-at-Arms from bringing in any person who might be arrested before we addiscurrent.

adjourn.

Mr. GARDNER. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly not.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. It seems to me that would be the result if the resolution were adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will decide that question when it comes up, if it ever arises.

The question was taken; and on a division there were-ayes 68,

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 9, 1897.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE RED RIVER BETWEEN THE STATES OF ARKANSAS AND TEXAS.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, in behalf of my colleague [Mr. McRae], I ask consideration of the following bill. It is a very short one

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1723) to approve and ratify the construction of a bridge across the Red River between the States of Arkansas and Texas, at a point above the town of Fulton, in Arkansas, on said river, built by the Texarkana Northern Railway Company, but now operated and owned by the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company, and to authorize the latter company to maintain said bridge over said waterway, subject to certain stipulations and conditions.

The bill was read at length. The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as

Add the following new section 7, to be inserted between sections 6 and 7, and change number of present section 7 to 8:
"Sec. 7. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date of approval thereof."

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the amendment recommended by the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to ask the gentleman from Arkan-

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to ask the gentleman from Arkansas a question. This seems to be a bill to validate the construction of a bridge already built, and not the construction of a new bridge. It is not in the usual form, and I should like to have some explanation before unanimous consent is given.

Mr. TERRY. The report of the Chief Engineer explains the whole matter. This is a bill that I have called up at the request of my absent colleague [Mr. McRae], who is detained at home by the sickness of his daughter. I do not know very much about the bill; but I know this, that it has been approved by the Chief of Engineers, General Craighill, has the unanimous indorsement of the committee, and is in the usual form of bridge bills.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, I have no objection.

Mr. TERRY. I move the adoption of the amendment recommended by the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to. The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was

The dueston was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TERRY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. POWERS. I call-for the regular order.
Mr. HENDERSON. Pending that, I make a motion to reconsider. On page 607 of the RECORD I find the following resolution was adopted by the House last night:

Resolved, That the order directing the Sergeant-at-Arms to take into custody and bring to the bar absent members be made returnable on Tuesday morning next, after the reading of the Journal.

I move to reconsider the vote by which that resolution was adopted.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, it was impossible to hear what the gentleman said.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves to reconsider the vote by which the following resolution was passed last evening.

Resolved, That the order directing the Sergeant-at-Arms to take into custody and bring to the bar absent members be made returnable on Tuesday morning next, after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. THOMAS. Is that in order, after the regular order has been demanded?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to be heard on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan desires to be

Mr. DOCKERY and Mr. HENDERSON. The motion is not

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will hear what the gentleman from Michigan has to say.

Mr. POWERS. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this is the regular order.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, first I desire to state that the gentleman was not present.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I hope we shall have order. We can not hear one single word.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will please take their seats and cease conversation.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker— Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiryto know whether it is too late to submit a question of order against the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is too late to submit a point of order against the resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would like to inquire if the Chair has Mr. RICHARDSON. I would like to inquire it the Chair has decided on the regularity of the motion now pending; that is to say, whether it displaces the special order of to-day? Now, I understand a motion to reconsider is a privileged motion, and that it might be entered as a privileged motion; but how does that bring up the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The resolution involves the arrest of members of the House, which would seem to be a question of privilege.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, in order to avoid interfering with the regular order, I am willing that the motion may be entered and disposed of after the regular order is disposed of.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The special order is a matter of privilege.

Mr. THOMAS. I am willing that it should go over until Tues-

Mr. HENDERSON. Let it go over until Monday, after the regular order is exhausted. I do not want to interfere with the regular order.
Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. A parliamentary inquiry,

Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I wish to know if it is competent for the gentleman from Iowa to enter a motion to reconsider, he not having been here and voted for the resolution itself? Mr. HENDERSON. You do not know.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Yes, I do.

Mr. HENDERSON. You just tell what you do.

The SPEAKER. There not having been a yea-and-nay vote, the Chair can not take cognizance of that. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that this matter may be postponed until after the vote is taken upon the Pacific funding bill.

Mr. THOMAS. I will agree to that if the gentleman will consent to have it go over until Tuesday.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I understand that the House last evening ordered the Sergeant-at-Arms to place under arrest a large majority of the House of Representatives. [Laughter.] Now, if this question goes over until Tuesday, will not those members be at least constructively under arrest, and can they participate in the business of the House?

The SPEAKER. Some such difficulty might arise if the question should go over until Tuesday.

Mr. HULL. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I think the matter ought to be decided now, because those members will undoubtedly desire to vote on the pending bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I think I have a right to enter my motion and let it go over.

The SPEAKER. The matter is now before the House, and the

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I think I have a light to eller my motion and let it go over.

The SPEAKER. The matter is now before the House, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Thomas] has been recognized.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] did not vote for the resolution which was passed last evening, and that therefore it is not competent for him to move to reconsider it.

Mr. HENDERSON. That makes no difference. I did not vote, and therefore I am competent to move to reconsider.

and therefore I am competent to move to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan has the floor to discuss the motion, unless some arrangement is made for postponement.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, this resolution was adopted in good faith and in the interest of securing a quorum of this House at the Friday evening sessions. It devolves upon me, as ranking member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to defend, to the best of my ability, the action taken by the House last night with that end in view. Therefore, in the first place, I think the objection is well taken that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] has no right to enter this motion, because the records of the House show that he was not present at the serious et which the House show that he was not present at the session at which the resolution was adopted, and I propose to object to the vote of every member who attempts to record his vote upon this proposition who was not present last evening, and who appears as being under arrest. The record of the House shows that certain members were absent and that the House directed the Sergeant-at-Arms to take them into custody and to report on Tuesday next. That was entirely in order, as will be seen by reference to page 300 of the Manual and Digest:

The House may, however, by resolution continue in force beyond an adjournment the order that the Sergeant at Arms take into custody and bring to the bar absent members, and may make such order returnable on a day subsequent to the day of adjournment.

Now, that the members put under arrest in pursuance of the order of the House would not have a right to vote on this question is clearly shown from clause 2 of Rule XV, which provides that "the House shall determine upon what conditions the members shall be discharged," and from clause 1 of Rule VIII, which provides that "every member present shall vote unless he has a direct personal interest." personal interest.

That the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Henderson] has no right to make the motion to reconsider or to vote is shown from clause 1 of Rule VIII, which provides that "every member present shall vote unless he has a direct personal or pecuniary interest in the event of such question." Now, every member who was absent has a personal interest, and clearly, under the rule, is not entitled to vote.

Mr. Speaker, if it is permissible for members of this House to absent themselves from the Friday evening sessions and then to come in here on Saturday morning and vote to do away with the come in here on Saturday morning and vote to do away with the action of the House for the purpose of securing a quorum at those sessions, it is obvious that that can go on indefinitely, and that no legislation can be accomplished on Friday evenings. A few gentlemen, I know, say that a part of the legislation enacted at these Friday evening sessions is unjust; but, however that may be, it is the duty of every member to be in his seat, so as to give the House a quorum, in order that justice at least can be done to the defenders of this country. I desire to be placed on record, first, as having objected to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Henderson] making the motion to reconsider, and second, as objecting to the vote of every member whom the Record shows to be under arrest, and I ask the Clerk to read, as a part of my remarks, the rest, and I ask the Clerk to read, as a part of my remarks, the names of the absentees—first those who were absent without leave, and then the report of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the names of the members whom he has already arrested and those that are yet to be arrested.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If this question is to stand over until next Tuesday, I desire to know whether the Sergeant at-Arms will furnish transportation, lodging, and food for the prisoners during that time? Laughter.

[Laughter.]
The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that a parliamentary inquiry in precisely that form. [Laughter.]
Several members addressed the Chair.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. THOMAS] has not yet finished his remarks.
Mr. HENDERSON. Has the gentleman a right to have the names read as part of his remarks?
Mr. THOMAS. I desire to have the names of the absentees

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman that they are already a part of the record.

Mr. THOMAS. I understand that, but for the information of the House and of the country, I desire to have them read as a part of my remarks

Mr. HENDERSON. The gentleman might put in the whole RECORD.

Mr. STEELE. I ask consent that the gentleman be allowed to print. He is, of course, more zealous in the discharge of his duties than any other member of the House. We all concede that. [Laughter.]

[Confusion in the Hall.] The SPEAKER. The House must be in order. The gentleman from Michigan is entitled to have the names read as a part of his remarks

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know.

Mr. THOMAS. The gentleman from Indiana will find, before ne is through with this matter, that he will not desire to have all his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. HEPBURN. I rose to a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.
The SPEAKER. Has it reference to the question before the House

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, sir; to this subject.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. HEPBURN. I desire to know whether it is competent for less than a quorum of this House to make a continuing or continnous order?

Mr. THOMAS. It is a matter of the highest privilege—
Mr. HEPBURN. Less than a quorum, as I understand, may remain continuously in session, but—
The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the statement of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] to be a parliamentary inquiry proper to be presented in the time of the gentleman from Michigan, and would not like to pass upon that question in this incidental way. The Clerk will read.

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a minority of the House can not make a continuing order. Where a quorum is lacking, less than a quorum may make an order for the arrest of absent members, but—

Mr. THOMAS. I now desire to have read by the Clerk, in justice to members, the names of those who were absent with leave.

Mr. CHICKERING. And those who came in under the rule and were recorded as present.

Mr. THOMAS. Those absent with leave or who were excused. The Clerk read the names of members who were absent on leave, as follows:

Mr. Little, Mr. Brown, Mr. Allen of Mississippi, Mr. Joy, Mr. Buck, Mr. Barrett, Mr. Gamble, Mr. Hutcheson, Mr. Pickler, Mr. Huff, Mr. McRae, Mr. Graff, Mr. Dockery, Mr. Hanly, Mr. Kulp, Mr. Russell of Georgia, Mr. Lewis, and Mr. Crump.

Members excused:

Mr. Curtis of Kansas, Mr. Northway, Mr. Strowd of North Carolina, Mr. Hyde, Mr. Howe, the Speaker, Mr. Reed, and Mr. Hadley.

The following members subsequently reported "present" under

Mr. CHICKERING, Mr. DINSMORE, Mr. DE ARMOND, Mr. GILLET of New York, Mr. Pugh, Mr. Snover, Mr. Sparkman, Mr. Sorg, Mr. Tate, and Mr. Wilson of New York.

Mr. THOMAS. I now desire to submit as part of my remarks the names of members for whom warrants have been issued and are now in the hands of the Sergeant-at-Arms. I ask the Clerk to read the names marked on the list which I send to the desk.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is not a proper matter to be presented—a statement of what the Sergeant-at-Arms has in his hands. That is no part of the record. The gentleman has no right to introduce that.

Mr. THOMAS. It is a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman introduces it as part of his

Mr. HENDERSON. But how can he make that statement—
Mr. THOMAS. I will state to the House that I get this information directly from the Sergeant-at-Arms.
Mr. HENDERSON. That is just why I object to it. The Sergeant at Arms is the proper officer to make that showing, and it geant-at-Arms is the proper officer to make that showing, and it should be made at a proper time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is having this list read as a part of his remarks. It has no official standing.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask that order be restored. We can not understand what is being done or said.

The SPEAKER called the House to order, and, after order had been restored, said: The Chair hopes that members, having resumed order, will keep order. The Chair will try to insist upon that; and he hopes to have the cooperation of all the members of the House. Gentlemen will cease conversation and remain in their seats unless they desire to retire to the cloakroom. The gentleman from Michigan will proceed.

the Clerk.
The SPEAKER. Is there objection?
Mr. WELLINGTON. I object.
Mr. THOMAS. Then let the names be read.
Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I rise to a point of order.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts. I make the point that it is not in order for any member in the course of his remarks to call other members by name. I understand that the gentleman from Michigan proposes to make this list a part of his remarks, and in doing gan proposes to make this list a part of his remarks, and in doing so he is naming members of the House.

Mr. PRINCE. I want to correct that roll. I claim the right

The SPEAKER. This is not a roll which is in any way official or subject to correction. It is a statement made by the gentleman from Michigan. It may or may not be true. It is not a question of privilege to correct the statement of a member on the ground that it is untrue. The gentleman from Michigan will

Mr. THOMAS. It must be presumed until the contrary is shown-

Mr. PRINCE. Will not the gentleman yield.
Mr. THOMAS. No; I decline to yield.
Mr. PRINCE. I was here; and that list is incorrect.
Mr. THOMAS. All right, if the gentleman wants to make that orrection. Members should bear in mind that this action on my decrease of the standard state of the standard standard state of the standard stan part is not directed toward individuals. Many of those whose names are on this list have been constant attendants at the Friday names are on this list have been constant attendants at the Friday night meetings, and are leading members of the House. If the order is carried out, everyone will have an opportunity to present his reasons for being absent, and there will be no injustice done. On the other hand, I have been informed that an attempt would be made to prevent business on Friday evenings, so I deem it a duty to emphasize the necessity of a quorum.

Mr. PRINCE. If the gentleman will turn to page 608 of the RECORD he will see that I was here and asked that one of my colleagues be excused. If those members who were here are to be punished as well as those who were away, all might as well remain away.

Mr. THOMAS. The inclusion of the gentleman's name in that list is undoubtedly an error, and I beg his pardon. The list was copied from that of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. PRINCE. I hope the gentleman will have my name stricken from that list.

Mr. MEREDITH. I suggest that the gentleman from Michigan have printed as a part of his remarks his petition for appointment have printed as a part of his remarks his petition for appointment as Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. THOMAS. I know of no such petition, and therefore am unable to present it for publication.

Mr. MEREDITH. I so heard, sir.

Mr. THOMAS. I presume, Mr. Speaker, that the Sergeant-at-Arms has been engaged in the active discharge of his duty since the order of the House was issued; and therefore it may be assumed that every gentleman whose name was read on that list, and for whom the warrant was issued, is under arrest.

Clause 4 of Rule XV provides that after being discharged from arrest they shall be given an opportunity to vote. So it is plainly to be inferred from this rule, and the other clause to which I called the attention of the Chair a few moments ago, that these gentlemen who are under arrest should not be allowed to vote until they are discharged from custody by the House; and further that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] who made the motion to reconsider this resolution was out of order for the same reason. And with this statement I am ready for the decision of the Chair.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, on the point that I had no Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, on the point that I had no of right to submit the motion it is unnecessary to consume any of the time of the House, because that point should have been made at the time the motion was submitted. It was too late afterwards.

Mr. THOMAS. I did submit it at the time.

Mr. HENDERSON (continuing). And I now demand the previous question on the motion to reconsider.

The previous question was ordered.

The question was taken on reconsidering the vote adopting the resolution; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Thomas) there were—ayes 180, noes 19.

Mr. THOMAS. On this I demand the yeas and nays. I desire to have it appear of record that the House refused the yeas and nays on this question.

The yeas and nays were refused, 16 members only voting in fayor thereof.

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the adoption of the original resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Thomas) there were—ayes 16, noes 165.

Mr. THOMAS (before the announcement of the vote). I rise

Thomas) there were—ayes 16, noes 165.

Mr. THOMAS (before the announcement of the vote). I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. THOMAS. I desire to ask the Speaker if he has counted on this vote any of those members who are under arrest?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not aware that any of the members are under arrest. The Chair has no such information.

Mr. THOMAS. I would like to ask—
Mr. STEELE. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan has risen for a parliamentary inquiry, and will state it.
Mr. THOMAS. I would like to ask if it is not a part of the record of this body that certain members are under arrest?

The SPEAKER. There is no record of which the Chair has any knowledge to that effect. Can the gentleman from Michigan point out such a record?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not desire to have any controversy with the Speaker; I only asked for information.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be very glad to answer the gentleman's inquiry, and if he can point to any such record, the Chair will consider the question that he has raised.

Mr. HENDERSON. I was informed, Mr. Speaker, that no arrests were made under that resolution.

Mr. THOMAS. The gentleman is mistaken in that.

Mr. HENDERSON. Not one.

The SPEAKER. If there is a record showing that there have been such arrests, the Chair would be very glad to have the gentleman furnish it.

Mr. THOMAS. Certain arrests were made last night; certain tleman furnish it.

Mr. THOMAS. Certain arrests were made last night; certain members were brought before the bar of the House and excused, and I am informed by the Sergeant-at-Arms that he has made some arrests this morning.

The SPEAKER. Neither the Chair nor the House has such information.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course the writ was not returnable until Tuesday next, and so the information is not officially before the House; but as a matter of fact certain members are under arrest.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not take cognizance of the question except on official information.

On this question the yeas are 16, nays 165. The noes have it, and the resolution is rejected.

Mr. HENDERSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I take it for granted that the adjournment last night suspended all further proceedings under the call; so that a motion would not be necessary. that a motion would not be necessary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not had the matter brought officially to his notice, but such has been the precedent hereto-

Mr. THOMAS. If that is done, I understand that it would set aside the ruling in former Congresses, notably in the Thirtieth Congress, and in the Fifty-second Congress, in which it was decided that the House had a right to continue the proceedings beyond adjournment.
The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide that question whenever it comes up.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move, in order that there may be no confusion with reference to the matter, that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with. There are important matters are important matters. to be considered to-day, important votes to be taken, and we had better settle the matter now.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, all further proceedings under the call will be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

PACIFIC RAILROAD FUNDING BILL.

Mr. POWERS. I call for the regular order.

Under the special order, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. PAYNE in the chair, for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8189) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; also to amend an act approved July 2, 1864, and also an act approved May 7, 1878, both in amendment of said first-mentioned act, and other acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, and oprovide for the settlement of claims growing out of the issue of bonds to aid in the construction of certain railroads, and to secure the payment of all indebtedness to the United States of certain companies therein mentioned.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House, general debate is closed, and the Clerk will report the first section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to ascertain the amounts of the respective indebtedness of the Union Pacific Railroad Company and the Kanasa Pacific Railway Company to which the subsidy bonds of the United States were advanced in aid of the construction of the Pacific railroads and branches as of the 1st day of January, 1897, upon the same principle as if the whole sum of said bonds and interest paid and to be paid by the United States thereon, and not theretofrer repaid by credits on account thereof, were to be paid to the United States in cash on said day; and the said sum shall be computed and ascertained as follows.

Mr. HUBBARD. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, in reply to what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] stated yesterday in reference to the four propositions that were submitted to our committee, wherein he attempted to prove that fifty-five million 2 per cent bonds are better than thirty-five million 4 per cent bonds, I have made a careful computation, and have the four different propositions worked out in parallel columns, and have had them printed for distribution to the members of the House for their information. They are so simple that any 10-year-old boy can them printed for distribution to the members of the House for their information. They are so simple that any 10-year-old boy can understand them, and I shall be glad to have members of the House look at the printed statement, copies of which I have here. The CHAIRMAN. The proceedings of the committee can not be interrupted by the distribution of printed matter now.

Mr. HEPBURN. I simply desire to say that "the gentleman from Iowa" made no such statement as the gentleman from Missey in Mr. Hunt and has asserted.

Mr. HUBBARD. You did make such statement.

I yield back the balance of my time to the gentleman from California [Mr. Bowers].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. Bowers].

ERS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Chairman, it would be better by far for Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Chairman, it would be better by far for the Government to cancel all claims it now has for money and bonds advanced to the Union and Pacific roads than to pass this vicious bill. Better to say to these corporations that have misused the bounty, diverted it from the intended public benefit to private gain, "Here, take your ill-gotten gains; we make you a present of the $113,000,000 you owe the peope, and now go away; we have had enough of the people's money. It is shapeful for you have had enough of the people's money. It is shameful for you to ask for millions more, and don't ask the Government to sustain and indorse your rascality and uphold your damnable monopoly longer. Go!"

Let it be remembered that no legislation is necessary at this time to protect the interests of the United States—of the people—in connection with these roads. Remember that this bill is brought in nection with these roads. Remember that this bill is brought in by the managers and manipulators who have made great fortunes out of these roads, whose private fortunes increased in an almost exact ratio with the fraudulent indebtedness of the roads, and who also now have this Capitol swarming with lobbyists and paid attorneys, urging the passage of this bill. Remember that this bill is wholly in the interests of these corporations; that it surrenders all the security the Government now has for its loans; that the aggregate liabilities of the Union Pacific are $186,868,161 on 1,038.68 miles of road, being at the rate of $158,461 per mile, $100,000 per mile of such liabilities being dishonest and fraudulent in every respect, for the honest cost of that road was less than

The Central Pacific liabilities are $185,033,682 for 860.66 miles of road, being at the rate of $215,153 per mile, of which not less than $140,000 per mile of liabilities are dishonest and fraudulent in every particular, for the honest and true cost of the Central Pacific did not exceed $75,000 per mile. The total fraudulent indebtedness of these roads is not less than $224,200,000, and this bill provides for the payment of 4 per cent interest on this fraud. That is one of the business propositions in this bill.

The supporters of this bill assert that these two roads, with a mileage of 1,899.34 miles, and capitalized, or having, as they claim, a bona fide indebtedness of $371,891,843, are not worth the amount of the first-mortgage bonds, about $62,000,000—not worth one-sixth of the indebtedness, and that they would not sell for over $40,000,000, not one-ninth of their indebtedness. And in the same breath they tell us that under the operations of this bill these corporations can and will, from the earnings of these almost worthless properties, pay the Government the $113,000,000 owing it, and at the same time pay 4 per cent interest on $258,891,843 of indebtedness outside of the Government's lien and 2 per cent on the Government claim. This is another of the preposterous business propositions contained in this bill.

Remember that this bill provides that the Government shall pay $62,000,000 more of the debts of these corporations, and as the Government is in debt about $1,000,000,000, upon which it is paying from 3½ to 6 per cent interest, it therefore must borrow money to make the payments called for in this bill at not less than 3½ per cent. And this further loan these corporations promise to repay within about eighty years, with 2 per cent interest. This is another of the business propositions of this bill.

How long will the credit of a nation or of an individual last that does business on such lines, borrowing money by the millions at 3½ per cent and loaning it at 2 per cent?

Remember that this bill, if it becomes a law, extends indefinitely the life and power of the most tyrannous and oppressive railroad monopoly that ever existed in the United States. That it indorses Pacific to the Southern Pacific of Kentucky, and which lease the Government directors say is the "main cause of the present deplorable conditions of the Union Pacific, being absolutely at the deplorable conditions of the Union Pacific, being absolutely at the mercy of the Southern Pacific, compulsion being brought to bear upon shippers who wish to ship by the central route to the east to compel them to ship by the Southern route."

Remember, when you pass this bill you give official notice to the people that there is one law for the great corporations and another for the plain people; that corporations are to be favored in court and Congress at the expense of the people. We had better lose many millions than do that. That is what makes Populists. Let it be remembered that this anaconda of the Pacific Coast, the Southern Pacific Company of Kentucky, proposes to swallow bodily the Central Pacific Railroad, through the infamous ninety-nine-year lease—it has it halfway down its rayenous maw ninety-nine-year lease-it has it halfway down its ravenous maw already, and this bill is to enable it to finish the job. It proposes to steal a railroad, and comes here to ask the Government to become an accomplice in the crime. The owners of the Southern Pacific Company of Kentucky sold millions of the stock of the Central road and now propose to freeze the purchasers out. Will the United States Government become a party to such a crime? I think not.

Realizing the poverty of their arguments in support of this bill, and to some extent the enormities contemplated in this attempted and to some extent the enormities contemplated in this attempted raid upon the Treasury, its supporters turn to romance and appeal to prejudice, and declare that this is the entering wedge of Populism. They know better, but they are hard pushed to make this scheme possible and plausible.

The Secretary of the Interior, regarding these roads, says:

In determining what course should be pursued, two objects should receive consideration: First, the collection of the debt due the Government: second, the creation of a great through line from the Missouri to the Pacific. This was the original purpose of the Government leading to the issue of these

Mr. Chairman, this bill will absolutely defeat both these objects. The Secretary goes on to say:

I will not undertake to review the conduct of those who have managed this property, and who have misused the Government's aid. A most interesting presentation of the facts will be found in the report of the commission appointed under authority of an act of Congress approved March 3, 1887, consisting of Messrs. Anderson, Littler, and Pattison. If a suggestion of leniency on the part of the Government should be made in the interest of those who received the Government's bounty, a study of the facts which this commission developed will show that the time has come to regard only the interests of the Government.

The following table states the amount due on the subsidy bonds and the first-mortgage bonds, and also gives the credits on account of the sinking fund. It shows what would be the investment of the Government in these properties if it is compelled to pay off the first-mortgage bonds, which alone are superior to the Government lien. It would be an increased investment of $64,613,000 to save an investment already made of $117,436,000. As the properties are worth very much more than the first-mortgage bonds, and as the Government has the second-mortgage bonds, the Government occupies the position of being forced to make good the first-mortgage bonds in order to secure its own claim. If the first-mortgage bonds, on any plan of extension, are simply those of the railroad company, they could not be disposed of at the low rate of interest at which the Government bonds would sell. As the interest which they would draw comes out of the property to which the Government must look for payment of the second-mortgage bonds, it would seem clearly better that the Government should assume the first-mortgage bonds, guarantee them, and put the rate of interest at the figure for which the Government bonds sell if the bonds are to be renewed or extended.

He says further, referring to the tables in his report:

He says further, referring to the tables in his report:

He says further, referring to the tables in his report:

It will be seen that the average annual net earnings of the Union Pacific and Central Pacific main lines during the past ten years have been $8.181,220, while the total amount of the first-mortgage bonds and the Government bonds issued upon the main lines, less the sinking fund for the main lines, is $152,-245,551.66. This annual net profit shows the properties to have earned nearly 6 per cent on the entire amount which the Government has paid and would pay if it were compelled to pay off the first-mortgage bonds. This being the case, it would seem to be a clear business proposition that the Government ought not to lose any large amount if it should be compelled through fore-closure to collect its debt.

As the original Government bonds and the first-mortgage bonds are about due, they can be paid off at their face value, and as a Government 3 per cent bond is worth more than par at the present time, there would be no difficulty in utilizing a new 3 per cent bond to pay off or call in both of the other issues. It will be seen that if such a course were pursued by the Government, and this property averaged in the future the same net profit that it has during the past ten years, it would earn sufficient to pay the 3 per cent on be bonds which the Government would be compelled to issue and yet have a yearly net margin of $3,089,963.

The Government should therefore be able easily to provide for the sale of the bond-aided roads to a new corporation which could meet the annual interest on a guaranteed 3 per cent bond equal to the first-mortgage and the subsidy bonds, and also pay a reasonable sum annually into the Treasury toward the liquidation of the entire bonded indebtedness.

the liquidation of the entire bonded indebtedness.

Mr. Chairman, these properties are valuable, and these men who, through the provisions of this bill, are attempting to get rid of the Government lien, know it. Let the Government remove that infamous incubus, the ninety-nine-year lease, from these properties, enforce the law, commence foreclosure proceedings, place a receiver in charge of the properties, and the revenues of both roads will be immediately doubled when they can be operated as one independent line. The Government is better entitled to its revenues in settlement of its debts than $200,000,000 of fraudulent liabilities. The Government is the sovereign. It should control these roads until it gets its just dues, which these roads can pay. This bill seeks to make corporations the sovereign and Govern-these roads until it gets its just dues, which these roads can pay. This bill seeks to make corporations the sovereign and Government the vassal.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, let no man deceive himself with the idea that these roads were built by the private fortunes of citizens. Where did they get the money to build these roads? In the first place, they got $61,000,000 from these subsidy bonds, on which the Government has been paying interest at 6 per cent for thirty years. In the second place, by the law of 1864 they got permission to subordinate the claim of the Government to another mortgage, which was not to exceed in amount the Government mortgage. They ran right up to the limit. They got $61,000,000 out of that. That makes $122,000,000. Then they got a land grant of 26,000,000 acres. They have already sold enough of the lands to take in $50,000,000 from that source. They have a lot of land left. I say nothing about the value of that. Add the fifty millions that they have already taken in for the sale of land to their one hundred and twenty-two millions that they got for the sale of bonds, that makes $172.000,000. That we have furnished them, without any call upon their own private fortunes. The law creating these corporations forbade them to sell one dollar of the stock for less than par, or for anything except money or money value. There may be a question as to how much they got for the stock. That is the only thing I am in doubt about, and that is the thing on which I have the oath of the officers of these companies.

Mr. LACEY The affidavits.

and that is the time on which I have the oath of the chicks of these companies.

Mr. LACEY. The affidavits.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Yes; the affidavits. On the 27th of September, 1870, Mr. Oliver Ames swore that the Union Pacific received $36,000,000 and some more from this source. the 28th of September, 1872, Mr. R. E. Carr filed an affidavit in the Interior Department, where all these affidavits are now on file, that the Kansas Pacific received $5,000,000 and some over from that source. On the 12th of September, 1871, Mr. Leland Stanford swore that the Central Pacific received $54,000,000 from that ford swore that the Central Pacific received $54,000,000 from that source, and the 21st of September, 1868, Mr. Pomeroy swore that the Central Branch got some $900,000.

In support of this I refer to page 140 of the Report of the United States Pacific Railway Commission of 1887–88.

Taking the amount received for stock as sworn to by these men, they got $97,000,000 for stock.

Add this item to the foregoing and we have the following cash resources furnished them by the Government with which to build the road:

First-mortgage bonds. United States 6-30 Government subsidy bonds. Land already sold. Stock	$61,000,000 61,000,000 50,000,000 97,000,000
Actual cost of roads	259, 000, 000 95, 000, 000
Profit on building the roads	164,000,000

There was a clear profit of $164,000,000. How was that profit divided? On the Union Pacific the Credit Mobilier was organized, a ring inside of a ring, a wheel within a wheel, and these officers were making bargains with themselves as officers of their own companies. They had all the assets of the company. As directors of the Credit Mobilier they built the road for themselves as directors of the Union Pacific, and voted to pay themselves therefor the entire assets of the Union Pacific Company. On the other end, the Credit and Finance Company, composed of the officers of the Central Pacific, made the same kind of bargain with the Central Pacific, and the entire assets of the Central Pacific were in the Central Pacific, made the same kind of bargain with the Central Pacific, and the entire assets of the Central Pacific were in like manner swallowed up. In that way they made $164,000,000 in the construction of those roads. That is something that we can not recall, and of which we should not complain if they would only pay their debts. The gift was princely, but there was some consideration. We got the opening of the country, binding together East and West, surmounting the obstacle to navigation discovered by Columbus, and all that; but what excuse are you and I, gentlemen, going to have, and what new and valuable consideration do we get for our country, if we now vote to give them a present of $228,000,000 more? That is what we would give them if this bill passes. Take, for instance, the Central Pacific. They are now owing us $57,000,000. We propose to lend them the money for eighty-five years at 2 per cent interest. We will have to borrow the money elsewhere to loan it to them. We must pay $\frac{3}{2}$ per cent or $171,000,000 of interest on that sum during those eighty-five years.

Statement of the practical operation of the Powers funding bill as applied to the Central Pacific Railroad Company alone.

The amount due the United States (1897)	$57, 681, 514. 29 171, 602, 505. 00
Principal paid by railroad (first ten years)	229, 284, 019. 29 111, 091, 588. 29
Loss to the United States	118, 192, 431. 00
Interest paid by the United States (eighty-five years) Interest paid by the railroad	171, 602, 505. 00 53, 410, 074. 00
	118, 192, 431.00
Average annual payment of principal by railroad	678, 606, 05 631, 547, 22

The same analysis applied to the Union Pacific shows that combining the two we shall lose in the transaction $228,000,000. It amounts to abandoning the debt and giving them a present of $116,000,000 besides. Now, those who went ahead of us thirty years ago could make some excuse to their constituents; but we can not. They got something; we get nothing. Do you expect, or do the railroads promise, to put on one more train a day or to run one train one hour fasterif we vote them this princely bounty? No. So far as the service to the public is concerned it is secured. No. So far as the service to the public is concerned, it is secured and paid for. The trains will run just the same, and never miss a day or slow up one mile by any vote here giving a new subsidy, collecting an old debt, or changing ownership.

What we would now like to know more than anything else is, what we would now like to know more than anything else is, what is this property worth on which we have a second lien? On that point we are hungering and thirsting after knowledge. On that point we turn from a reading of the report of the Committee on Pacific Railroads of this Congress in disappointment.

It is well enough to say that "the committee has given much study to the question," and that "from a conservative estimate of the earnings of the roads the committee finds that $4,000,000 is a fair across of their nearly across that are the same as the same and the same across the committee finds that $4,000,000 is a fair across of their nearly across that are the same across the same across fair average of their annual earnings that can be used as a basis of calculations," etc. But why not state the facts? What are the net earnings? If we have the facts we can make "estimates" and draw conclusions as well as the chairman of that committee.

Right there is where the failure to command the confidence of the House has come. Finding nothing on this point in the report, we must look for information elsewhere in scattered authorities as to the net earnings. All are agreed that that is the fairest basis for estimating the value of the property. From the report of the United States Railway Commission of 1887–88 and other sources, I have collected the following:

Net earnings of Union Pacific: 1870-79 1880-83 1884-87 1888-94 Net earnings of Central Pacific: January, 1870, to December, 1873 (4 years) January, 1874, to January, 1884 (11 years) 1885-1894 (10 years)	$58, 357, 133 45, 834, 986 24, 798, 267 80, 530, 711 23, 643, 246 85, 694, 971 59, 916, 082
Total net earnings, both companies (25 years)	358, 765, 396 14, 350, 000

On that basis of net earnings the property should be worth $280,000,000 (5 per cent net).

If honestly managed, the net earnings would long ago have paid all the debt.

From Senator Morgan's report to the present Congress I have taken the following: I will here insert a table of these figures for each company, taken from the best and only sources of information to which I have had access. They may not be exactly accurate, but they closely approximate accuracy:

Operating expenses Net income.....

What has been done with this money is a matter of the deepest concern to the Government, to whom it was, in large part, justly owing, and to the people, whose resources of industry and labor have been taxed to earn every dollar.

These figures indicate net earnings of $15,000,000 a year from 170. We have other guides as to the value of this property. We have the second lien. Our claim is certainly senior to that of the stockholders. Central Pacific stock has never failed any year to bay dividends. In proof of this I quote from an interview of Col. C. F. Crocker, vice-president of the Southern Pacific, published in the San Francisco Chronicle December 2, 1896, wherein

The Central Pacific is not on velvet, but it is not in the depths of despair into which the Northern Pacific has fallen, and the stockholders have been receiving a small dividend every year.

In the Weekly Financial Review of Henry Clews & Co. of January 2, 1897, we find that Central Pacific stock pays dividends of 1 per cent January and July. We also find in same authority the stock itself quoted at from $12 to $16.25, and the stock of the Union Pacific quoted at $8.50.

That would indicate that in the judgment of the men whose business it is to buy and sell these stocks every day in the open market the property is worth at least $15,000,000 over and above all the bonded debt.

And yet this bill is brought in on the astounding assumption that this great property will not sell for more than $61,000,000. The committee says: "The roads would, of course, go for what they would fetch, subject to the first-mortgage bonds, which it is believed would yield little or nothing for the Government on its

These railroads now owe the Government $112,000,000; prior liens (less $33,000,000 sinking fund), $61,000,000. If the property sells for $173,000,000 at foreclosure sale, it will pay the Government debt, principal and interest, dollar for dollar. Five per cent is considered good profit on property of this kind.

The question now is, Will a railway system which earned a net profit of 5 per cent on $280,000,000 from 1870 to 1894 now sell for $172,000,000?

There is a margin of over $100,000,000, besides the value of the stock, now selling daily in the markets for about $15,000,000.

For fear that the property may not bring enough to pay all our claim in the regular, orderly proceeding contemplated by existing law, the bill proposes to give these people the whole debt of $112,000,000 and a bonus of $116,000,000 straight from the Federal Treasury besides.

Treasury besides.

Instead of collecting this debt now due the Government, the bill proposes to loan these people $112,000,000 for eighty-five years at 2 per cent interest. We are paying 3½ per cent.

The difference between 3½ per cent (what the money costs us) and 2 per cent (what it is proposed to charge them) is a clear donation in money and would amount to $228,000,000 in eighty-five

Therefore I say that this bill, when stripped of all disguises, means not only an abandonment of the debt now due the Government, but a gratuitous donation of over $100,000,000 besides.

By skillfully dividing the proposed annual payments and parading some of them as principal and some as interest, it is made to appear as if the debt would all be paid, interest and principal, in eighty-five years. But the fact remains that if all the payments were counted as interest they would never amount to 3 per cent in any one year. Heretofore the prior lien has only been $61,000,000, less the sinking fund. Now it is proposed to increase the first mort-gage to $107,000,000 and make it cover the terminals and branches, which are already mortgaged for more than they are worth. This would have the effect of not only increasing the prior lien by $47,000,000, but it would also place the Government in the position of guarantor of the first mortgage thus increased. Few, if any, of the branch lines pay operating expenses, while the business they furnish the main line is about 60 per cent clear profit to the main line.

Instead of applying the earnings to the extinguishment of the debt, they have been divided among the stockholders as dividends on watered stock or squandered on fraudulent contracts in the construction of other railroads, sometimes competing lines. The Southern Pacific was built out of the earnings of the Central Pacific. Thus were the earnings not only diverted from the Federal Treasury, but used to destroy the road on which the Government had a lien by creating a rival and by so running both roads as to give the Southern Pacific the profitable business.

The branches will never be abandoned. The capital invested in their construction can never be reclaimed. Somebody will operate them, even if they must be run at a loss, and as long as they run they are bound to furnish more or less business—of a very profitable character—to the main line. As it is, the owners of the main line get all, or nearly all, the benefit of the branches without incurring the loss and risk of operating them.

In this view of the case the owners of the main line would clearly be better off to have somebody else own and operate the branches. If I owned the main line, I would not take the branches as a gift, although I would be very glad to have other people operate the branches, even if I had to pay them 50 per cent of the gross receipts from whatever business they might furnish to or from the main

So with regard to terminals. If they can not be bought or leased, they can be duplicated. It is nearer from Fremont to Blair, where the Government practically owns a bridge, than it is from Fremont to Omaha. Any city on the Missouri would gladly donate a bridge, as any city on San Francisco Bay would gladly give the ground and buildings to be made a terminus.

Advocates of the bill seem appalled, and are trying to stagger the House on account of the magnitude of the first mortgage. Sixty-one million dollars seems a large amount of money, but it must be become in mind that we have $23,000,000 actual account lates. must be borne in mind that we have $33,000,000 actual accumulated cash in the sinking fund now at our command, available to apply on the first mortgage, and that the roads are actually earning about $15,000,000 a year over and above operating expenses.

The gentleman from Missouri has shown us that it will only be necessary to raise about $30,000,000 to pay off the first mortgage.

If we are afraid of the first mortgage now, how can we expect our successors to be any braver if we now add to it $47,000,000 more and leave the way open to run it up to $500,000,000 when the accumulated interest of nearly a century shall have done its

The Government directors in their report in 1895 advised foreclosure. In 1896 they renewed the same recommendation. have never advised funding or extending in any such way as proposed in this bill. They have from long years of training in the service of the Government become experts and specialists. Their advice should count for something. What are we to do, then? My answer is simply, Do nothing. There is nothing for us to do, My answer is simply, Do nothing. There is nothing for us to do, unless we want to give away the rights and the money of the United The laws creating these railroads provided all the machinery for enforcing the rights of the Government when the fullness of time should come and the default occur. The time has come, and the default. The clock has at last struck the hour. We can now either foreclose or the Secretary of the Treasury can simply take possession of the property without foreclosure, as provided in the original act.

In neither event is Government operation necessary. We have of late years been too well accustomed to seeing the Government operate railroads through receivers to be scared at that.

The enforcement of our rights is now an executive function and not a legislative one, and I for one am willing to rely with confidence on any administration in the belief that the President of the United States will protect the rights and the property of the United States. He is sworn to faithfully execute the laws. I believe he will do it. There are laws enough now on this subject. All they need is enforcement, and if given a chance the President All they need is enforcement, and if given a chance the President will do it. The Reilly bill of last Congress proposed to give us first mortgage and 3 per cent interest. This bill offers a second mortgage and only 2 per cent. We who spurned that bill and rejected it by an overwhelming vote certainly can never vote for

Mr. DANIELS. I move to strike out the last word. In my judgment we can not adequately determine what is the obligation and the duty of the United States at the present time without looking at the circumstances which existed prior to and contemporaneous with the construction of these railroads. At that time the States were disintegrating themselves, and threatened the destruction of the Union. There was no means of communication between the East and the West except by sea and by crossing the Isthmus of Darien. This communication was liable to be intermediated and broken up at any time by the intermediate. to be interrupted and broken up at any time by the interposition of the war vessels of the Southern Confederacy. It was regarded as an imperative necessity, therefore, that a means of communication should be created through the country that could not be subjected to these risks. Every loyal person from one end of the country to the other felt the necessity of establishing communications between the East and the West and connecting these extremities substantially together.

The people at that time were earnest in their desire that these railroads should be built for the purpose of so uniting the country. try and operating this means of communication. There was no private company, no private interest, that could raise the funds necessary to construct the railways, and accordingly the Government, actuated by the highest patriotism, concluded it to be necessary to aid and assist, by its subsidies in land and otherwise, the construction of the railroads. The circumstances were all looked upon carefully and weighed deliberately, and it was concluded that it was the only manner in which the construction of these roads could be assured. The people were all desirous that the object should be attained and secured, too, by the interposi-tion of the Government of the United States; and they were all satisfied at the time that these measures were enacted that what the Government had done for the purpose of securing this great enterprise assured the success of its operation.

There was no feeling at that time, and none until long after these roads had been constructed, against the action of the Gov-ernment, that the people had not received what they regarded as a full equivalent for all the Government had given by its subsi-dies and assistance; and the railways have hitherto connected and united the East and the West together, and secured a means of transit which at the time when it was first projected was beyond the attainment of all possible private enterprise. The country has received what it deemed to be just and proper, and a fair return for what was given to assure the success of this great enterprise in that time. These are the circumstances under which we are in that time. These are the circumstances under which we are required to look at the situation. We must look at the circumstances and facts which were contemporaneous with this action of stances and facts which were contemporaneous with this action of the Government to judge of its wisdom. The Government deemed it to be proper, deemed it to be wise, to make these concessions and to expend these resources upon these companies; and if the companies and their promoters did, as they undoubtedly did, make a large profit out of this assistance, the Government considered that itself received an equivalent for it from the success of this great enterprise, and the profit has resulted to the companies by reason of the circumstance that it was not then adequately un-derstood, and could not be understood, what would be the benefits resulting to the companies and their promoters from the great conresulting to the companies and their promoters from the great concessions that were made to promote the construction of these railways. These benefits are beyond the power of the present to recall.

It was also believed, as the fact turned out to be, that this enterprise, in its success, would tend to promote the settlement of new States in that part of our country, as well as to unite the East and the West internally together. These railroads have rendered great services to the people of the United States, and to a very great extent certainly have furnished an equivalent for that which they received from the Government for the purpose of aiding in their construction. We can not recall or rectify the past; neither can we say that the concessions that were made, either in the form of subsidies or by grants of land, in view of all the circumstances, were improperly made. They have become a fixed fact in the legislation of the country, and now the question before us is simply what we shall do to settle this long-standing controversy.

[Here the hammer fell.]
Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended for three minutes

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to any extension of time on the other side, but every man from the Pacific Coast has been shut out from the general debate, and I will consent to this extension only on condition that some of us on this side may have additional time.

Mr. HEPBURN. There will be no consent of that kind given, Mr. Chairman. If the gentleman was shut out yesterday, it was by his own election, and not as a basis for this kind of proposition. The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended three minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. DANIELS. Without detaining the House unnecessarily,
I will simply add that the settlement of this indebtedness between the Government and these companies has become an urgent matter—one of the most urgent before the Congress of the United States. Heretofore several propositions have been advanced with the view of securing a settlement, propositions much more advan-tageous to the companies than the one now before the House. One the latest of those propositions was rejected by the House of Representatives, in part because it proposed to surrender the sinking fund to the companies, and also proposed to sure them great advantages beyond that surrender. The bill before us has been drawn carefully and plainly. It is a measure which is believed to be the best that can be obtained at this time for ending this dispute which has come so frequently before the United States Congress, and in my judgment no better service can be rendered to the people of this country than the prompt passage of this bill and the adjustment of this controversy in the manner proposed by it, instead of leaving it as a legacy to the new Administration, to annoy, embarrass, and torment that Administration when it shall come into existence.

The message of the President of the United States shows that the present Administration is in favor of an adjustment of this question, and, as I have already said, this bill seems to be the best that the circumstances will permit us to expect. Therefore, for the purpose of closing up the controversy and securing to the Govthe purpose of closing up the controversy and securing to the Government the best results that it can probably get under all the circumstances of the case, I think the House should pass this bill, and let the past be buried without further animadversions, criticisms, or condemnation. The passage of this bill will promote the interests and the quiet of the country, and will give the Government all that there is any reasonable ground to expect it can possibly secure from these companies. The controversy has been too long open. The people expect it to be closed, and no proposition for the purpose of closing it has been brought before the House that seems to be so well adapted to that object as the one now under consideration, which the House will soon be called upon to either adopt or reject. In conclusion, I can do no better than to add the following letter, received this morning from a distinguished merchant and trader of the city of New York.

NEW YORK, January 8, 1897.

DEAR SIR: The National Board of Trade, at its last annual convention, appointed a committee, of which I am chairman, to present to Congress, its views on certain measures connected with transportation interests, among which is the Pacific railroads funding bill, which is before the House at the present time. The business interests of the country believe that a settlement of this question would be an important factor in reestablishing confidence in commercial and financial circles, and that the Powers bill should pass.

Whatever differences of opinion exist, the facts remain that the original roads were a necessity; that the Government gave land grants to encourage competing roads, which reduced the earning power of the original roads and made it impossible for them to meet their obligations at the time stipulated, and that the realized advantages of their construction have been so great that the benefit of any doubt should be given on the side of refunding the obligations. Outside of a small socialistic minority, who would be glad to see all the agencies of production and distribution "nationalized," the great majority of the American people believe in individual effort. If one section can have its products transported below cost at the expense of the other sections, we would have commercial chaos, the consequences of which no one can foresee. I therefore hope that when the question comes to a vote you will be present and vote according to your own good judgment as to what is for the greatest good of the greatest number.

Faithfully, yours,

F. B. THURBER.

P. S.—We also need an amendment to the interstate-commerce law, giving railroads the same right of contract enjoyed by all other persons and corporations. In no other way can unjust discriminations be prevented. Pooling by railroads is necessary to secure reasonable, uniform, and stable rates, and under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission there is no danger of an abuse of this power. The National Board of Trade, representing the views of the average shipper, as distinguished from that of the favored few, is in favor of this amendment as well as a uniform classification of freight.

debate on this question, but I was an attentive listener to the debate of yesterday and to the debate so far as it has progressed to-day. In the light of the statements, estimates, and arguments, I shall cast my vote against this bill. It seems to me that the House is entitled to a complete financial exhibit of the affairs of this corporation in its relation to the Government. We ought to have an ample and complete fiscal exhibit. We are dealing with an alleged insolvent debtor. The information thus far furnished to the House—at least so far as the debate of yesterday and to-day is concerned—relates mainly to the indebtedness of the Government and the amount of the first-mortgage bonds. It appears by the statements of gentlemen who have examined this question that the Government has loaned its bonds upon which it has paid interest, and that these companies are thus liable to the Government to the amount of, perhaps, $112,000,000. It also appears that there are first-mortgage bonds ahead of the second-mortgage bonds of the Government amounting to about $61,000,000. In other words, the aggregate of the first and second mortgage liabilities is In the light of the statements, estimates, and arguments, words, the aggregate of the first and second mortgage liabilities is about $175,000,000-something near that, in round numbers.

about $175,000,000—something near that, in round numbers. Now, it becomes material to us as business men to know the value of the railroad property upon which these two mortgages rest. What is the value of the 2,200 or more miles of road upon which the Government has a second lien? What is the value of the terminal facilities that are proposed to be included in the mortgage contemplated by this bill? What is the value of the unaided lines proposed to be included in the bill? What is the amount of the mortgages already existing upon these unaided lines? What is the amount of the liability, if any, upon these terminal facilities? The House is entitled to this information. The gentleman from Vermont—the chairman of the committee—is an able and well-informed gentleman, and can no doubt give us this information. informed gentleman, and can no doubt give us this information.

If it has been already given I have not heard it—

Mr. POWERS. I wish to say—

Mr. DOCKERY. We are entitled to a complete exhibit, so that when we make a statement of assets and liabilities this House and the country will know the resources of these companies available the ccuntry will know the resources of these companies available for the payment of this debt.

Mr. POWERS rose.

Mr. DOCKERY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. POWERS. The gentleman has said that he was not present during the first day's debate on this subject—

Mr. DOCKERY. That is true.

Mr. POWERS. At that time this matter was fully stated. If the gentleman will examine the Record and the reports on this case, he will find all this information.

Mr. DOCKERY. I should be glad to have the gentleman state.

Mr. DOCKERY. I should be glad to have the gentleman state to the House the total estimated value of the terminal facilities

Mr. POWERS. The total value, at the very lowest possible estimate, is certainly not less than $15,000,000. Some well-informed persons say that the terminals at Denver alone are worth $10,000,000.

Mr. DOCKERY. What are the liabilities existing to-day against those terminal facilities?

Mr. POWERS. Those liabilities consist simply of a first mort-gage which goes into and forms a part of the fifty-four-million-dol-lar mortgage that covers the whole thing.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then, as I understand from the gentleman, the net value of the terminal facilities, according to his estimate, is $15,000,000 over and above existing liabilities.

Mr. POWERS. Yes; at the very lowest estimate.

Mr. BOATNER. The gentleman does not mean over and above existing liabilities? Mr. POWERS. existing liabilities?

Mr. POWERS. No; not over and above existing liabilities.

There is a small first mortgage on all these properties; but that first mortgage, by the way, is included in the new first mortgage that the bill contemplates shall be executed.

Mr. DOCKERY. Now, there are certain unaided lines to be

Mr. POWERS. All are covered by the first mortgage, I think.
Mr. DOCKERY. What is the amount of the first Mr. POWERS. I can state it in a word.
Mr. DOCKERY. I shall be glad to hear the gentleman's state-

Mr. POWERS. The first mortgage on the entire system, including terminals, including branch lines, including aided and unaided portions, aggregates $54,000,000. The first mortgage prior to that of the Government on the aided lines is included in that estimate.

Mr. DOCKERY. But what I want to get at are the existing conditions. First, we want to know what is the fiscal situation, and then we desire to understand what you propose.

Mr. POWERS. On the aided portion of the lines the mortgage in round numbers is $33,000,000 in the case of the Union Pacific and twenty-seven or twenty-eight million dollars—

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope the gentleman will give us the totals.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Dockery] has expired.

Mr. POWERS. I ask that the gentleman may have three min-

Mr. DOCKERY. I should be glad to have that much additional

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to extending the time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY]? The Chair hears

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman states that the complete exhibit for which I have been asking was given in his remarks on the first day of this debate. I stated at the outset of my remarks that I had not heard the gentleman speak and had not had time to read his speech in the RECORD. But what I want to know and what the House is entitled to know is the amount of the first mortgage upon the total line, then the amount of the Govern-ment lien as it exists to-day. Now, it is proposed, as I understand, ment lien as it exists to-day. No to include certain unaided lines.

Mr. POWERS. Yes, sir.
Mr. DOCKERY. And certain terminal facilities. I assume that mortgages exist upon these unaided lines and these terminal facilities

Mr. POWERS. They do.
Mr. DOCKERY. If we can get at the estimated value of the new lines, the unaided lines, and the terminal facilities, over and above the amount of the existing mortgages, and a practical estimate of the value of the 2,200 miles of road, we may then be able to determine something as to the solvency of the debtor.

Mr. POWERS. I would state to the gentleman from Missouri that on the aided portion of the line the underlying existing first mortgage on the Union Pacific is $33,000,000 in round numbers. The new obligation of the road will amount to $54,000,000, which shows about $21,000,000 more than the first mortgage, which covers the unaided lines, plus the terminals and plus the branch lines. Now, the branch line of what is known as the Kansas Pacific system extend from Korea City mortgage distance. Pacific system extends from Kansas City westward for a distance of some 394 miles. As I have just stated, the addition of these lines carries the amount to $54,000,000. The Government mortgage at present rests only on the aided portions of the line, and carries a maximum of, say, $33,000,000 in round numbers. So, under this proposed arrangement, we will own all of these lines; that is, that we will have a mortgage upon them all for the amount of $54,000,000, and thus get possession of property estimated within the last six years by the commission appointed for that purpose to be worth $92,000,000; and this has been enhanced by recent increases in the way of depots, side tracks, facilities, and so on.

Mr. DOCKERY. Now, then, if the gentleman will permit me—and I desire to deal in round numbers, for it is impossible to fix in the memory with the precessory account these detailed for the in the memory with the necessary accuracy these detailed figures—but I would like to know, in round numbers, his estimate of the value of all the properties included in the bill that he has presented, covering the 2,200 miles of road, the terminal facilities, and the unaided lines? Let us have in round numbers the value of all of them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. POWERS. I would like to ask another minute's time. The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection, the gentleman will proceed for a minute longer.

will proceed for a minute longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. POWERS. There is no question, I would say to the gentleman from Missouri, from the most conservative estimates made with reference to the value of this property, including the depots, side tracks, equipment, and so on, that the property is worth from forty-five to fifty thousand dollars a mile.

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, what is the total? We have been dealing with totals in recard to the indebtedness of the Government.

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, what is the total? We have been dealing with totals in regard to the indebtedness of the Government. What is the gentleman's estimate of the value of this property? Mr. POWERS. Well, it is forty-five times two thousand, or about ninety-odd million of dollars, I should say, in round numbers, without stopping to calculate exactly.

Mr. DOCKERY. Is that the total?

Mr. POWERS. But, if the gentleman will permit me, I have only included one read.

only included one road.

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, what is the total, including all of them?
Mr. POWERS. Taking the whole of them, it is in the neighborhood of $170,000,000 in value.
Mr. DOCKERY. That I understand to be the estimated value of all of the property included in your bill, against which stands the indebtedness of the roads, including the first and second

Mr. POWERS. If the gentleman will pardon me an interruption, I can give him the exact figures quoted by the commission. We have, in this report of the commission, a total value, estimated, in the Union Pacific system, of about $230,900,000.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] a few minutes ago cited the case of the United States against Stanford in support of the proposition that the Government had no right of action against the directors and officers of these railway companies for the restitution of the property and assets of the companies of which they had unlawfully possessed themselves. But the Stanford case has no reference whatever to this question, and it does not bear upon it directly or indirectly. In that case the United States undertook to avail itself of a statute of the State of California which makes the stockholders of all corporations liable for the debts of the corporation in proor all corporations hable for the debts of the corporation in proportion to the stock they hold in such corporation. The Supreme Court merely held in that case that the rights of the United States in the premises depended upon the statutes of the United States creating the corporation itself, and authorizing the issue of stock, and that the United States could not avail itself of the statutes of California for the purpose of maintaining a personal action not authorized and permitted by the statutes of the United States in the act creating the corporation. So that proposition, as quoted by the gentleman, has no reference to the question now pending before the House and to which the gentleman from Ohio addressed himself.

So far as this question is concerned, it appears to me that if the gentlemen who are so industriously investigating its legal aspects would look at it from the standpoint of the interests of the United States there would not be very much difficulty in reaching a satisfactory mode of obtaining a business settlement of it. If a private individual owned the debt of the United States against these railroads, the first step he would take would be to get in the hands of the officers of law all of the assets of the corporation which could be subjected to the payment of his debt. That can easily be accomplished. It can be accomplished readily if this body will enact the simple business legislation necessary to reach it. These railroads have defaulted on their obligation to the United States Government, or they will do so unless they pay reach it. These railroads have defaulted on their obligation to the United States Government, or they will do so unless they pay what they owe the Government. If they do this, that renders any action on our part unnecessary. If they do not, then the United States must take the necessary steps to protect its rights.

Under the plain terms of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, rendered in 1878, the time for action by the Government has arisen. It is now perfectly competent for Congress to forfeit the charters of these companies, to direct that their affairs be put in the hands of receivers or of liquidators, and to direct those liquidators to bring the actions which these companies should have brought long ago, and which they would have brought had they not always been dominated by the very individuals whose interests would be affected by the suit to recover what was due these companies. We could easily put these companies into the hands of liquidators or receivers, who might be authorized to bring suit against the directors and officers for the funds of which they have unlawfully deprived the companies, and against the stockholders for the stock which they have received and for which those stockholders have never paid.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOATNER. Just one moment. If these suits shall be decided adversely; if it shall be decided by the courts of the United States that these actions do not lie; if the Supreme Court reverses its decision of 1878 in the case of The United States vs. The Union Pacific Railway Company, it will be time for us to take into consideration what we ought to do in the way of funding and extendsideration what we ought to do in the way of funding and extend-ing these debts. But certainly, sir, in advance of a legal decision, in advance of any accurate and reliable knowledge of what the decision of the court will be, or what the result of this litigation will be, we ought not to give the indorsement of this Government to the most flagitious frauds which have ever been committed in the administration of a public trust. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

man from Ohio.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Is there anything in this bill which prevents these suits from being brought, if this bill is passed?

Mr. BOATNER. Why, most unquestionably.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Have you read the bill?

Mr. BOATNER. Yes, I have read the bill.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Do you not know that the last lines of the bill provide that very thing?

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Chairman, I will meet that question. The gentleman certainly must know, as a lawyer, that the very moment he makes a settlement with his principal debtor, anything in the line of a creditor's bill, anything in the shape of a collateral action against anyone else for that debt, immediately perishes, and can not be preserved. perishes, and can not be preserved.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Have you read the last lines of this

Mr. BOATNER. Congress can not do it. This is one of the things beyond the power of Congress to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BOATNER. I should like to have another minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks that his time be extended one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOATNER. Why, the gentleman knows that the United States can not receive in payment from the Union Pacific and from the Central Pacific bonds in settlement of its debt, and then the property and the state of the debt, and then the property and the state of the turn around and sue anybody else with respect to that debt. These people would plead this settlement as a discharge, and that the United States had no interest to prosecute the claim to which I have referred.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. When the act under which the settlement is made expressly provides that we may do so?

Mr. BOATNER. That is a necessary consequence of the passage of any funding bill, that it would give a complete discharge. These parties who are indebted to the Union Pacific and to the Central Pacific can only be reached by actions brought through those corporations.

Mr. ARNOLD of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to add Mr. ARNOLD of Pennsylvania. Mr. Charman, I desire to add a few remarks to what I said yesterday. In the first place, I want to refer to some alleged facts and figures submitted by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Hubbard]. It is said that figures will not lie, but it depends largely on who makes the figures.

In the first place, in his calculation as to the proposition by the reorganization armittee the gentleman only sent terms 20,000 cm.

In the first place, in his calculation as to the proposition by the reorganization committee, the gentleman only counts some $30,000,000 of principal in that calculation, when he should have counted approximately $55,000,000. In the second place, that proposition, which I now hold in my hand, provided, among other things, that the Government should be coequal with the first lien as it now exists to the extent of $35,000,000, and that a blanket mortgage of $100,000,000, a first mortgage, should be placed on this property, thirty-five millions of which should go to the Government. For the balance of our indebtedness we were to take stock. Now it made the Government practically a partner with that ment. For the balance of our indebtedness we were to take stock, Now, it made the Government practically a partner with that first mortgage to the extent of $35,000,000, and practically, as you will see, obligated the Government to look after the interest. The other parties to the mortgage would say, "We can not pay the interest, the earnings of the roads will not permit us to do it, and therefore let the Government come down and pay our 4 per and interest." cent interest."

cent interest."

That was one of their propositions. In other words, the syndicate comes in, represented by Mr. Marvin Hewitt, of the Chicago and Northwestern, and Mr. Depew, of the New York Central, and they ask the small sum of $6,000,000 of this preferred stock for services in getting this proposition through. Our committee abandoned that and took up the calculations. We have submitted it here to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Hubbard] and every member of the committee, except, perhaps, the gentleman from Louisiana, who is very rarely present in the committee, as he has been continuously engaged in a contest. We have made calculations ad infinitum, and we have brought before this House a bill which we submit in good faith, and I believe it is the best possible so tions ad infinitum, and we have brought before this House a bill which we submit in good faith, and I believe it is the best possible solution of this difficulty. What more does this involve? It was suggested here in the argument yesterday that a bill should have been presented covering the entire road and making this one line. Any gentleman who is a member of the legal profession will see that it is absolutely impossible by any act of Congress or by any court in existence to say that we can legislate so that we can make one line of these two. That can only be accomplished by a foreclosure and a purchase of both lines, and operating them under a new charter as one road. charter as one road.

There is another proposition that I desire particularly to call the attention of the committee to in this matter, and that is this: That if this bill does not pass it means Government foreclosure. It means Government ownership of the road. Now, what does foreclosure mean? It simply means the United States must pay off this first-mortgage lien of $60,000,000 against the two companies, and that $60,000,000 more of Government bonds shall be increased. Within the last time property was here bed $200,000,000. issued. Within the last two years we have had $262,000,000 of Government bonds issued; and I want to say to the people of this House now, that the people of the United States are tired of issuing Government bonds. The defeat of this bill simply throws upon the United States and the next Administration the necessity of the issuance of at least $60,000,000 to protect itself against the first lien against this property. Neither admitting nor denying any alleged frauds of a generation ago, it must be admitted that the building of the Pacific railroads was great in conception, marvelous and masterful in execution, and most beneficent in results. It is such genius and force as that possessed by men like Mr. Huntington which have made this a great nation and us a great people. [Here the hammer fell.]

[Mr. HILBORN addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to offer a substitute for the pending

The proposed substitute of Mr. Harrison was read, as follows: Strike out all after the enacting clause in the bill and insert the following.

Strike out all after the enacting clause in the bill and insert the following to wit:

"Section 1. That the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Attorney-General, and their successors in office be, and they are hereby, appointed a commission with full power to settle the indebtedness of any and all the bond-aided Pacific railroads to the Government, upon such terms and in such manner as may be agreed upon by them and the owners of said railroads: Provided, That any and all settlements thus made shall be submitted in writing to the President for his approval or disapproval, and unless approved by him shall not be binding.

"Sec. 2. That said commission or any member of the same is hereby authorized and empowered to administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance and take the testimony of witnesses, and cause to be produced all papers and documents needed in the course of their negotiations.

"Sec. 3. That said commission shall within sixty days after the assembling of the next regular session of Congress report their action to it, and, in case of their failure to settle said indebtedness or any part thereof at the time of making such report, to recommend such legislation as in their judgment may be necessary or proper to protect the interests of the Government and to enforce the prompt collection of any of said indebtedness that may then be due and unpaid.

"Sec. 4. That the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expenses of said commission in carrying out the provisions of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, this substitute will be

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, this substitute will be considered as pending. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the other day I had printed in the RECORD a substitute which I now ask unanimous consent

In the RECORD a substitute which I now ask unanimous consent to offer as a substitute for the substitute of the gentleman from Alabama and for the pending bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. Bell] asks permission to offer a substitute, which has already been printed in the Record, and which he now sends to the Clerk's desk—a substitute for the substitute offered by the gentleman from Alabama. Is there objection to the substitute of the gentleman from Texas being considered as pending? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. ordered.

Mr. BELL of Texas. This substitute is very lengthy, and I think perhaps it will not be necessary to take up time in reading it just now. I ask that the reading be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks that the reading of his substitute, which has already been printed in the Record, be dispensed with. Is there objection? The Chair hears

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration is decidedly the worst measure for the settlement of the Pacific rail-road debts ever offered to Congress, the worst proposition that has ever come from those companies. Two years ago, in the Fifty-third Congress, the Reilly bill, an infinitely better bill than this, was voted down because of its viciousness, yet it was far more favorable to the Government than this bill. Here are the differences between the two: The Reilly bill extended the period for the payment of these debts for fifty years at 3 per cent per annum interest, while this bill extends the debts for eighty-six years at 2 per cent per annum interest. The Reilly bill provided for a first mortgage on each of the roads to secure the Government; this bill provides for a second mortgage to secure the Government.

The Reilly bill put no mortgages ahead of the lien of the Government except those now superior to it; this bill puts other mortgages on terminals and feeders, amounting in the case of the Central Pacific road to at least $14,000,000 more than the value of the so-called additional security now offered, ahead of the Govern-ment's claim. The majority of the committee has not stated what those additional securities are, has not stated what title the companies have to any of them, has not stated what are the incum-brances now upon them, and has not stated whether any of those incumbrances overlap the aided portions of the road and are now subordinate to the Government liens. The only excuse for this is that the committee has not knowledge of the subject sufficient to give the information. The fact is, that there is a sixteen-million-dollar blanket mortgage resting on the Central Pacific system, which is a first mortgage on the Oakland Mole, the western terminus, so far as the proposition before the House is concerned, of the Central Pacific Railroad. It is a third mortgage on the remainder of the system, and is now subordinate to the present Government lien. Under the Powers bill it will all be included in the first mortgage and become prior to the Government lien.

Now, the Oakland Mole is not worth more than two to three

Now, the Cakland Mole is not worth more than two to three million dollars, and at least $13,000,000 of the mortgage now subordinate to the Government lien is to be made prior to it. In that item alone the Government is made $13,000,000 worse off, with respect to its security, than it is to-day. Every other piece of so-called additional security is mortgaged beyond its value. The California and Oregon Railroad has a first mortgage resting upon it which amounts to $4,000,000 more than the road is worth

The other feeders of the Central Pacific are mortgaged, every one of them, to the amount of not less than $40,000 a mile; how much more none of us know. The committee does not know enough about those properties or the titles or the incumbrances or the relation of the liens to each other to advise this House what it should do with respect to them. Not a word of testimony was taken before the committee. Not a witness before it made his statement under oath. The committee invited gentlemen to come before it and make voluntary unsworn statements—the statements of interested parties and their agents, who for thirty years have been lying to Congress and to all others who have had to deal with the interests of the Government in these matters.

The surviving partner of Leland Stanford made an unsworn statement which is accepted as gospel truth by the committee about matters concerning which Mr. Stanford refused to testify before the Pacific Railway Commission, and was released from the obligation to testify by the United States circuit court on beloes communications.

This failure of evidence to establish any of the facts essential to this settlement should of itself cause the House to reject this bill. I have repeatedly called the attention of the House and of the chairman of the committee to this glaring and fatal defect in their showing. They do not deny it. They can not deny it. Yet, with amazing pertinacity, they still ask the House to be satisfied and pass the bill. I say to you that this House will never be in a position to be desirated in the line of these claims position to be desirated in the line of these claims position to be desirated in the line of these claims position. tion to legislate intelligently for a settlement of these claims until a court of competent jurisdiction shall have tried and determined all questions relating to the validity of all alleged liens and the relation of all valid liens to each other. Such a decree is absolutely sary as a basis for legislative action, if any legislative action shall then seem wise or necessary, but to legislate now in the dark in utter ignorance-on a question of such importance, would be monstrous monstreus.

The interests of the Government are not in any danger. The Government will have no payments to make on the first mortgages until foreclosure, nor after foreclosure, unless it becomes the purchaser at the sale. The Government must pay its subsidy bonds, no matter whether the debts are funded or not, and nothing more, except the expenses of the litigation, need be paid at any time, unless the Government buys the roads.

The Attorney-General has suggested certain amendments to the Thurman Act in mere matters of procedure, which should be made, and let foreclosure proceed.

Thurman Act in mere matters of procedure, which should be

Why, sir, for twenty-five years the validity of a large proportion of the so-called first-mortgage bonds of the Central Pacific Railroad has been in issue. To the extent of several millions of Railroad has been in issue. To the extent of several millions of dollars they were issued contrary to law, and not for the purpose of constructing the road. The Thurman Act expressly reserved the question of their validity.

This question was submitted to the Committee on Pacific Railroads on an able brief prepared by Mr. John T. Doyle, of San Francisco. The committee has made no report on that question. but by its bill waives the rights of the United States in this behalf reserved by the Thurman Act.

I raised this question on the discussion of the Reilly bill two years ago, and then insisted that the reservation in the Thurman Act must have been made advisedly and for substantial reasons. Members of the committee then assured the House that the reservation was due merely to Senator Thurman's cautious method of drafting bills and had no definite purpose.

I have since examined the record of that debate and find that in answer to a question asked of him by Senator Sargent, while the bill was under consideration, Senator Thurman stated that the reservation was made and must be retained, because of the certain invalidity of some of the first-mortgage bonds and the alleged invalidity of a great number of them. This reservation means several million dollars to the Government and should not be Four million dollars and upward have been unlawfully paid by these two companies to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company as a subsidy to keep up freight rates, and were fraudulently charged to operating expenses of the roads.

These expenditures can be recovered for the Government in the courts, but this bill will waive its right to compel the return of the money so diverted.

The directors of both roads have been found to have diverted to themselves through fraudulent contracts made with close corpo rations controlled by them-the Credit Mobilier in the case of the Union Pacific and the Contract and Finance Company in the case of the Central Pacific Railroad. The Pacific Railway Commission shows in its report that they have diverted enough of assets to pay the present debts due the Government. Most of these diverted assets can be recovered by proper suits in equity, yet this bill waives the right of the Government to pursue them. The stockholders' subscriptions have never been paid. They may be compelled to pay those subscriptions if the Government should fail to realize enough by a sale of the roads. This present right of the Government the committee asks Congress to waive by this bill. All of these questions should lie judicially before Congress undertakes to make a compromise with the debtor companies.

Again, the Central Pacific Railroad Company will cease to exist on the 1st of June, 1911, by operation of the constitution and laws of the State of California, under which it was incorporated.

Its lease of life can not be constitutionally extended unless it is expected to make an act of Congress override the constitution of the State in a matter of purely domestic concern, such as the life of an artificial person created under the laws of the State.

It is therefore absurd to contract with that company for payments to be made after 1911.

I am opposed to the whole refunding scheme. Foreclosure is the only sensible business method of dealing with these properties and claims as they now stand.

I can not close these remarks without noticing some of the extraordinary statements made by the gentleman from California [Mr. Johnson] in his speech of yesterday. That speech is the most remarkable instance that has ever come to my knowledge of the resident of a glass house throwing stones, but I am concerned only about answering the attacks made and shall confine myself to that purpose.

The gentleman said that I, among other Representatives from California, would support and vote for the Powers refunding bill if left free to follow my own convictions and judgment in the matter, and that I am opposing it against my conscientious convictions solely on account of my fear of the San Francisco Examiner and its proprietor, Mr. Hearst. By that statement he sought to brand me before this House as an unfaithful Representative.

He further sought in the same speech to smirch my reputation by stating that I was the personal friend and official defender of Mr. William R. Hearst, whom he attacked in terms of foulest

With respect to the first statement of the gentleman to which I have called attention, I say that it is absolutely false and without the slightest shadow of foundation in fact. I am opposing the Powers bill, as I have opposed all similar bills, solely on my own judgment and because I am conscientiously convinced that it is a vicious measure.

As to the second statement of the gentleman to which I have called attention, I say that I am the personal and political friend of Mr. William R. Hearst. I have known him personally since of Mr. William R. Hearst. I have known him personally since his childhood and know him to be a man of honorable character and strong human sympathy. In his journalistic career he has shown himself a man of the highest genius and of sterling worth. He sympathizes with the afflicted and gives largely of his means to relieve distress. He loves justice and contends for it. He hates injustice and opposes it practically. He hates oppression and fraud and scourges them in high as well as in low places. He has done more than any other hundred men to purify the politics of California, and he is doing more to-day to purify the polities and the political institutions of the United States than any other man within its horders. But he has one grievous fault. other man within its borders. But he has one grievous fault. He is not merciful to the tyrants or the corruptionists whom he assails. This fault causes bitter and sometimes powerful enemies (I do not refer to the gentleman from California) to rise up against him. Every human reptile that formerly reveled in the corruption with which his efforts have interfered hates him as it hates sunlight and spouts venom at him whenever it gets into a place of comparative safety. In their rage for revenge the vicious ones whom he has assailed are not restrained by any consideration of conscience or veracity. The worst falsehoods that polluted minds are capable of breeding are by them preferred to truth. I am speaking now of the sources of the gentleman's information against Mr. Hearst.

Now, sir, I sat here on Friday last and heard with mingled feelings of horror and disgust the scurrilous attack made by the gentleman from California [Mr. Johnson] upon Mr. Hearst. That attack was false in every sentence—false in every charge. I brand it now as false in whole and false in every detail.

Mr. Hearst needs no defense at my hands in this or in any other matter. When the historian shall come to estimate his character, the venom of all the enemies that he has made in the service of his country and of civilization will not weigh against it. But I would not feel that I had done my duty if I should permit so virulent an attack to be printed in the permanent record of Congress without placing in the same record the brand of its falsity.

I will not further notice any of the contemptible falsehoods concerning Mr. Hearst's private life, but the charge that he levied blackmail on the Southern Pacific Company is tangible and requires some attention. The facts upon which this charge is based, as nearly as I can remember them, are these: About five or six years ago the Southern Pacific Company made a contract with the San Francisco Examiner for advertising, during the World's Fair period, for thirty months, at the rate of $1,000 per month.

The advertising matter was published and the agreed price paid by the company for twenty-two months. Then a controversy arose. The Examiner had occasion to editorially denounce some schemes in which the company was interested. The company insisted that because of its advertising patronage the Examiner should refrain from attacking its interests editorially.

Mr. Hearst, through his business manager, immediately replied, repudiating that principle of business, and stating that under no repudiating that principle of business, and stating that under no circumstances could the advertising patrons either affirmatively or negatively control the editorial or news columns of the paper. There the matter ended, until Mr. Huntington, a few months ago, in a moment of impotent anger, stated that he, or the company, had paid the $22,000 to the Examiner as blackmail. Mr. Hearst immediately published the contract and the correspondence concerning it. The gentleman from California [Mr. Johnson] said that Mr. Hearst had admitted receiving $22,000 from Mr. Huntington as blackmail. That statement is simply false.

The gravamen of the charge of the gentleman from California in that transaction is that Mr. Hearst was not honest because he would not stay bought.

would not stay bought.

I deny that Mr. Hearst was ever bought in that or in any other transaction; but far be it from me to deny that his accuser believes in the Tweedian definition of honesty, which he quotes with such hearty approval.

I have said that the charges made by the gentleman from California against Mr. Hearst were false in whole and in detail. Need I say that they were maliciously made? I leave their characterization in that respect to the members who heard the speech and saw its author during the delivery of that portion of it. Enough of Mr. Johnson. "Too much Johnson."

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, when I had the honor of reporting the rule for the consideration of this bill to the House I made quite a careful examination, not of the merits of the question, sir, for I had not the time to do that, but to ascertain what had been the position of the executive officers of the Government on the point as to whether we ought to take up the question and on the point as to whether we ought to take up the question and on the point as to whether we ought to take up the question and do something about it or not. I found almost an unbroken line of recommendations, from the President down, favoring some action by Congress upon the subject. I stated at the time we brought in the rule that however members might vote on the rule reported, it would not interfere with their voting, of course, as they pleased after the consideration of the bill had been completed in the

But I was struck with one fact. If those having the power to foreclose the Government's mortgage did not proceed to do so, and turned toward the legislative branch of the Government for help, by the substitution of some other mode of action, it was to my mind prima facie evidence of the fact that there was not in their opinion a satisfactory remedy by foreclosure. And this discussion, Mr. Chairman, has confirmed in my mind the impression made by that investigation.

I have endeavored to avoid, in listening to this discussion, any influence whatever upon my mind by the local motives of any member of the committee. I am not here to criticise local motives member of the committee. I am not here to criticise local motives or local interests. I assume that every member of this body is, like myself, trying to represent his people; and my own judgment is that little is to be gained by crimination, recrimination, or personal abuse, or by assaults made on the motives of the advocates of either side of the question.

We have all of us discovered, no matter how long in years our term of service has been, the impossibility of obtaining a detailed knowledge of the various matters pending before the various committees of which we are not members. To a large degree we are compelled to accept the information given to us by our colleagues on the several committees who have made careful and detailed examination and determination of the matters referred to them. I find tion and determination of the matters referred to them. that out of 14 members on the Committee on the Pacific Railroads, 12 of them are unanimous in recommending to this House that foreclosure proceedings is not the best thing for the Government in this matter. Eleven of them unitedly urge the proposition under discussion reported by the committee. One of them, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Bell], has a proposition of his own; but he was forcible in his remarks in the expression of his opinion that foreclosure would not give the best results to the Government creditors.

Now, stripping this question of a thousand matters that stand out in the past, we are brought face to face with the question of out in the past, we are brought face to face with the question of what is best for us to do for ourselves as members of this body in respect to this indebtedness. I am not going to attempt to enter into the old, stale questions and allegations that have been thrown into this discussion in battalions, and which go back of and do not touch the vital question at issue. I try to look at this matter as if I owned this claim myself, or if a client had come to me and said, "Mr. Henderson, counsel me as to what is best to be done to get as much money as I can out of this claim, an inferior lien." In that light alone do I look at it.

There are two things clearly demonstrated in my mind by the discussion. First, we all agree that the claim of the Government is a second and inferior lien and that the claim of the first lien holder takes precedence over ours and is first to be settled.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Mr. HENDERSON. I should like very much to be permitted The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks for an extension of his time for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Preliminary to consenting, I would like to ask how it is that other gentleman can not have their time extended?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object?
Mr. RICHARDSON. I shall not object. I only wanted to get that information

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HENDERSON. I never have made an objection in my life to such an extension.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman must not understand me as having made an objection. I only wished to ask why others could not have the privilege extended to them. I made no objec-

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand the position of my friend from Tennessee, and I believe in a full discussion of the matter. I shall not transgress beyond the five minutes kindly given to me by the committee.

This first lien, it is evident to my mind, substantially exhausts the assets of the debtor companies. I am satisfied with the statements made in this debate that if the Government mortgages are foreclosed on the properties of these companies, the Government claim will be left substantially unsettled. Of that I feel satisfied from all that I have learned in the course of the discussion.

Another thought occurs to my mind in considering this question. I believe that the plan proposed will substantially secure the Government's debt. There are conflicting views in regard to the Government steet. There are connecting views in regard to this matter, but one fact stands out clearly in my mind in the event that we make this effort. If it does fail, we will know it within a reasonable length of time, and we will certainly be no worse off then than we are now. Standing here, then, trying to save $111,000,000 hopelessly lost by foreclosure proceedings, are we not justified in endeavoring by this plan to save that sum for the Government, or at least to save the most of it? Are we not justified in taking what seems to be, and what the committee says is, the very best step in the premises? I have examined the bill carefully to see whether a default on the part of these companies carefully to see whether a default on the part of these companies authorizes prompt action by the Executive, and I find that point carefully and fully guarded in the bill. Default makes all come due; so that if we are being played with, and good faith does not underlie the propositions presented by this bill, we lose but little time, and if default comes it is within our power to move along the lines now open to us and still protect ourselves so far as that protection will go.

In brief, then, I feel this: All, or substantially all, will be lost by foreclosure. I hope that we may save all, or most of it, by compromise. If it were my own property, Mr. Chairman, I should endeavor by this proposition to save my claim, rather than rush into the vortex of the courts by foreclosure, when this investigating and recommending comparison. ing and recommending committee, substantiated by my own judgment, gives no encouragement for any satisfaction.

These are all the observations I care to make. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McLACHLAN. Mr. Chairman, in the brief space allowed me for the discussion of this bill there is not time to refer but briefly to the history of the railroads under consideration. the law of 1862 the right of way was granted these railroads, 12,600 acres of land given for every mile to be built, and subsidy bonds issued at the rate of $16,000, $32,000, and $48,000 per mile, according to the character of the country through which the roads were to be built. These bonds were to constitute a first-mortgage lien upon the property and were to be repaid in thirty years.

This was a princely donation, but the originators realized that they could do better, and took no active steps for two years, when the land grant was doubled, the lien of the Government subordinated to a second place, and a first mortgage allowed to be placed upon the property equal to the original grant of subsidy bonds, amounting to about $64,000,000.

Then the gentlemen comprising the original projectors of this scheme, whose combined capital was insignificant, built the Central Pacific for $58,000,000, capitalized it at $139,000,000, and divided the profits and Government subsidy among themselves. The Union Pacific was manipulated in a like manner through the Credit Mobilier, and as a result $324,000,000 was paid to stockholders of the Pacific companies. In addition to the $64,613,000 of bonds received, there were $1,900,000 acres of land granted. But notwithstanding these princely fortunes accumulated by reason of the fabulous liberality of the United States Government, from the very incention of the enterprise there seems to have been a standar very inception of the enterprise there seems to have been a steady design on the part of those who had grown rich by this liberality to prevent the Government from ever realizing anything upon the advances it had made or the obligations it had assumed. From being the lessors of the Southern Pacific Railroad lines in Califor, nia, New Mexico, and Arizona, the Central Pacific was placed under control of the latter company and its earnings practically limited to a 2 per cent guaranty.

The roads were completed on May 10, 1869, and the Government delivered the last of the bonds. Five years later, when the railroad companies were asked to account for the 5 per cent of their road companies were asked to account for the 5 per cent of their earnings provided by law to be paid the United States, they denied that the roads were completed. This point was decided against them by the United States Supreme Court, and they then insisted that there were no earnings, because they had been expended in building branch lines upon which the Government had no legal claim. They denied the rights of the United States to a lien on the towningle and the Omele Bridge and these greatings are the states. the terminals and the Omaha Bridge, and these questions are now pending in court. Both companies brought exorbitant charges against the Government for carrying mail and troops, and these were disallowed by the Court of Claims. They denied the right of the Government directors to meet with the directors of the Union Pacific Railroad Company. The Union Pacific, with an original mileage of 1,821.86 miles, now has 7,672.09, the difference being built out of the profits of the original grant, but upon which the Government has now no legal lien.

These railroad companies went openly into politics and put out railroad tickets in the Western States. So notorious did this become that when the Credit Mobilier scandal was exposed but little surprise was manifested. Then came the Wilson investigation of 1873; and the reports of that committee present a most astounding state of affairs. Then the Thurman Act of 1878 was astounding state of affairs. Then the Thurman Act of 1878 was passed, requiring the roads to pay in all of their earnings from transportation of mail, troops, munitions of war, and 25 per cent of their net earnings, which constituted a sinking fund. The railroad companies at once tested the constitutionality of this law. It was sustained by the United States Supreme Court, and suddenly, in 1880, seventeen years before the debt became due, the railroad companies started an active effort to have their indebtedness to the Government funded. There had been no intimation of insolvency prior to that time by either company. Their stock ranked high in the market; dividends were paid with clock-like regularity, but suddenly it developed that they were "about to become insolvent,"

In 1887 another commission reported, and this report, as in case of the Wilson committee, charged gross frauds from the inception of these companies. Acting upon these reports, the Fiftieth Congress passed a law authorizing the Executive and Attorney-General to proceed to foreclosure in case the indebtedness was not paid. Every Congress since that time has been besieged by these companies. Is their past record such as to inspire confidence in the stability of any agreement they might make in the future?

The first thing that a prudent man does when entering upon a contract is to put in figures just what he obligates himself to pay and what the other party is obligated to pay or do.

It is a well-known fact that United States bonds can not be floated bearing a less rate of interest than 3½ per cent.

This bill provides that the Central and Union Pacific shall pay

2 per cent interest on the uncanceled portions of their debts to the Government. In addition they are to pay "installments of principal" aggregating $730,000 a year for the first ten years, $1,000,000 a year for the next ten, and $1,500,000 annually thereafter until the debt is "paid."

The principal of the debts amounted on the 1st of the present month to about $121,140,942.39.

The funding bill provides for certain offsets which reduce this figure slightly.

The first annual payment made by the Central and Union Pacific will be $2,422,818.84 for interest and $730,000 for "installment," or will be $2,422,818.84 for interest and $730,000 for "installment," or $3,152,818.84 in all. After that the railroads will pay less and less for ten years, when they will be paying for interest and installment combined $3,021,418.84, or 2.5 per cent.

During all this time the Government will be paying its own creditors on an equal amount of debt $4,239,932.98 a year in interest, none of which will be counted as an installment on the principal. In this period of ten recent the will be dead of the property o interest, none of which will be counted as an installment on the principal. In this period of ten years the railroads will have reduced the principal of their debt by $7,300,000, and yet they will lack $11,528,141.43 of having paid the Government as much for interest and principal combined as it will have paid its creditors for interest alone on the money it has been obliged to borrow by reason of the nonpayment of this railroad debt.

The next year the "installment" will increase to a million dollars, and that will bring up the total railroad payments for the year, including interest, to $3,276,818.84, or 2.7 per cent on the original debt.

From this point they will decline for ten years more, until in the tenth year they will amount to $3,096,818.84, or 2.56 per cent. In this period of ten years the total railroad payments for interest and principal combined will lack $10,531,141.43 of meeting the cost of similar loan to the Government for interest alone.

The railroads will then owe the Government $103,840,942.39, which they will pay off at the rate of $1,500,000 a year until it is all extinguished.

The first year this "installment," plus interest at 2 per cent, will amount to $3,576,818.84, which will be equivalent to 2.95 per cent on the original debt. That is the largest payment that will ever be made in any one year during the whole course of the liquidation, and it will fall short by $663,114.14 of the amount the Government will have to pay its creditors for interest alone during every one of the eighty-nine years the process will last, and every year thereafter until it chooses to pay the principal in full.

These installments will clear off the entire debt in about sixtynine years more, making about eighty-nine years from the begin-

The last full year's payment for interest and installments combined will amount to $1,540,000, or 1.27 per cent on the original debt, and about $2,700,000 less than the Government charges for interest alone on a similar debt.

The state of the account at the end of the process will be this: In the first ten years the Government will have paid its creditors in interest on the money it has been obliged to borrow by reason of the nonpayment of this railroad debt $11,528,141.43 more than it will have received from the roads for interest and principal combined. In the next ten years its excess of payments will reach

In the remaining sixty-nine years it will pay $117,025,125.64 more than it will receive. By the time the railroads have "extinguished" their debt their aggregate payments to the Government for interest and principal combined will lack $139,084,408.50 of the Government. ment's payments for interest alone, taking no account for interest on interest. And while the railroads will then be free of the debt, the Government will still owe the whole original principal, amounting to $121,140,942. Its total loss from the funding operation, therefore, will be $260,225,350. The total amount of the payments for principal and interest under the provisions of this bill will amount to about 2.3 per cent on the principal debt for eighty-nine years, and at this rate would leave the principal debt still unpaid and the the Government. due the Government.

This is not a proposition for the railroads to pay the United States Government, but purely and solely for the United States to present it with millions of dollars more than they have already

There is not a railroad company in the United States that would not pay liberally to have its indebtedness funded for ninety years at 2 per cent. No such proposition was ever made before, and I venture to say that no such proposition would ever be entertained for a moment by any money lenders in the world under similar circumstances

That it should have received the indorsement of the committee is astounding, and I can not think that they ever carried the fig-tres out and learned what the proposition actually meant.

This bill in effect provides that the companies shall be given a clear receipt for all they have obligated themselves to pay, and, in addition to that, be presented with a further subsidy.

It has been well stated in one of the minority reports that it is not shown this is the best we can do, and on the face of the proposition it is evident that it is the worst we could do.

The bill provides that the companies shall double the amount of the present first-mortgage indebtedness, and, in return for this reducing the present value of the security to the Government, collateral lines are included, all of which are heavily mortgaged Are they worth the amounts they are already mortgaged for? Are they not already mortgaged for more than they are worth? We have no information upon that subject. In fact, the bill shows that the committee possesses no information. It in terms makes a contract in ignorance of the facts upon which it rests, and makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain the facts after the contract is made. He is not empowered to change the contract, should the facts show it to be a bad one. It makes the contract absolutely without the facts, and calls upon the Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain them afterwards. such a dealing in the dark be justified?

But it is said, and emphasis given to the statement on the floor of this House, that something must be done, and the time is short in which to do it. The question must be settled. Why must something be done? The time is short in which to do what? Has not the question been settled?

The United States Government at enormous expense formed a commission composed of three of the ablest lawyers in America. They heard testimony which fills ten immense volumes. They rendered their decision. That decision was ratified nine years ago by the Congress of the United States with the evidence before ago by the Congress of the United States with the evidence before it, and after long, exhaustive debates upon every phase of the ques-tion, Congress acted and passed a law.

Under the act of March 3, 1887, the President is authorized to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to "redeem or otherwise clear off such (any) paramount lien, mortgage, or other incumbrance" on these roads prior to that of the United States "by paying the sums lawfully due in respect thereof out of the Treasury. is also authorized to direct the Attorney-General "to take all such steps and proceedings in the courts and otherwise that shall be needful to redeem such lien, mortgage, or other incumbrance, and to protect and defend the rights and interests of the United States in respect of the matter in this section mentioned, and to take steps to foreclose any mortgage or liens of the United States on any such railroad property."

Congress has declared that the matter should be settled in the only branch of Government where all of the law and equity can be adjusted—the judicial. Who has ever objected to this very proper mode of collecting this indebtedness, the only one which a private individual or a corporation would ever think of adopting through their attorneys? Have there been any protests, any demands upon Congress that it should independently of the courts and the duly constituted legal authorities of the United States take this matter out of their hands? Have the people expressed a lack of confidence in the Executive and the Attorney-General? the plenary power to make such settlement as will best subserve the interests of the people given by this law, has anyone accused the Attorney-General of incompetency to fulfill the duty imposed upon him? It is a matter of personal knowledge to every member of this House that there have been no such protests from 70,000,000 people. They are not only satisfied to let the law take its course, but through the columns of the press, in political conventions, in mass meetings, and by petitions they have demanded that the law take its course. For whom is the time short? Not for the Government, for this is not a proposition to effect a settlement, but to extend the time for a century and to burden an already bankrupt Treasury with great additional obligations. Whose interests are in jeopardy? To say that those of the Government are is a reflection upon the Executive and the Attorney-General. Whence, then, comes this clamor? From the debtors only. Usually it is the creditors who insist that a debt shall be adjusted, but every session of Congress since that which placed the whole matter in the law department where it properly be Congress has been besieged by emissaries of these railroad companies, claiming that the people's interests demanded that a settlement be made of a debt that was not due. Are they afraid the courts will do justice, and do they believe they can influence Congress to prevent justice being done? The proposition is an insult to every member of this body, but it is the only legitimate explanation of the constant presence of the Pacific railroad lobbies.

In this case the Government is the creditor, the railroad companies the debtors. Nine years ago the creditor placed this entire matter in the hands of its attorneys, with full power to protect the interest of the Government, and the debtors were notified of that Ever since that time the debtors have been importuning the creditor to take the matter out of the hands of its attorney with-out even consulting him and settle it without the assistance of legal counsel. No course of that kind would ever be justified in case of an individual or a private corporation, and should not be in case of the Government. What will be the result if Congress fails case of the Government. What will be the result if Congress fails to act? Why, there will be a full hearing in a court of competent jurisdiction and a decree rendered in accordance with the law and facts, protecting so far as possible the interests of all concerned. Is such a course a calamity calling for the hasty interposition of Congress?

I use the word "hasty" intentionally, for it would be hasty, to use the mildest term, for this Congress, without the assistance of a judicial commission and without exhaustive sworn testimony, to overrule the decision of the Fiftieth Congress, which had the benefit of those aids, and that, too, when no one except the railroad companies objects to the decision then reached. What will be What will be the result if we do pass this bill? We must receive less than we pay out, relinquish even what control we have of these companies, and tax posterity for the next ninety years—a monument of folly! Is this result so desirable that we will be chargeable with neglect of duty if we allow the law to take its course and thus fail to provide this legacy of debt to our children and our children's

But this has been likened unto a composition with creditors by which time is extended. It shows no such phase as presented in this Congress. Robbed of all superfluous verbiage, it is simply a proposition that one creditor—the Government—pay the debts of the other creditors at 100 cents on the dollar, reduce the rate of interest more than one-third below actual cost of carrying, turn the property over to the debtors, allow them to retain all of the profits, and their remote descendants will pay the principal in case they feel so disposed. Any court in the United States would appoint a guardian over any man who would accept such a proposition, and treat him as non compos mentis upon the applica-tion of any relative. It has not even the advantage of being ingenious

It is objected that only one-seventh of these systems are embraced in the main lines upon which the Government liens rest, and that with these branches in the hands of the companies the main line can not do business. While I am not inclined to dispute that the tail may wag the dog, yet if the tail is cut off I do not think the dog will die and the tail continue to wag. As these branches are feeders to the main lines, they can only be operated in connection with the main lines, not in competition with them. The branches may represent more mileage and be more profitable than the main lines, but the former can not be operated at all without the latter, and as the more they carry the more profitable they are, they will carry just as much to the main lines if they pass out of the hands of the owners as they do now. At any rate, the insolence of the argument is too great for it to be accorded much respect. The railroad companies say: "You advanced the money and we built the lines. Out of the profits we bought and built branch lines that belong to us and not to you. Our roads that we bought with the profits of your roads are more profitable than your roads; therefore, as you can not do anything with your roads without ours, you ought to give them to us."

The prospect that the Government may have to buy in the roads

The prospect that the Government may have to buy in the roads frightens some people. It is not necessary that the Government should buy them in if that course does not appear desirable. Nor will the court confirm a sale where the price bid is grossly inadequate. Take judgment as in any other foreclosure suit, and let the railroad be run by receivers until an adequate bid is received. The fact that his client did not want to buy a railroad would not deter a lawyer from proceeding to collect a debt against one.

The "bogy man" of the Government ownership of railroads has seemingly been conjured up by the railroad people to frighten timid legislators, and every time it is mentioned there are loud cries of "Paternalism!" It has not usually been supposed that the Governments of France, Germany, Belgium, and Bavaria were paternal. These are the prominent countries that have tried the Government ownership of railroads. In all of them it has been a success. There have been no failures to record against the system in Europe. Charles Francis Adams, jr., a former Government director of the Union Pacific Railroad, and subsequently president of that company, wrote a treatise against the Government ownership of railroads, taking the ground that an entirely different state of affairs existed in the United States from that found in Europe. But he was honest enough to make the following statements. I quote from his book:

To satisfy everyone always is a result not likely to be attained under any system or in any country. Meanwhile it may, with tolerable safety, be asserted that the Belgium system is as satisfactory to the people of Belgium as the nature of things human permits that it should be. Certainly the public feeling points very distinctly toward the acquisition of the remaining lines of the system by the Government, while the sale of the Government lines to promote corporations has never been urged by any considerable party. Financially the undertaking has proved a decided success.

As to France he says:

Though not especially enterprising, the companies are, as a rule, solvent, impartial, and reliable. Indeed, those managing them look with simple astonishment on the wild fluctuations in the railroad tariffs incident to the American method of operation, and they do not hesitate to say that if any similar outrages were perpetrated on the French people and business public by them the question of the state ownership of railroads would immediately assume a new shape. Such proceedings would not be tolerated.

I do not intend to discuss at length the pros and cons of the question of Government ownership or operation of railroads, or to take any ground upon that question as an independent proposition. But under the existing conditions of these Pacific railroads and their relations to this Government, rather than pass this bill I would prefer to see this Government try the experiment of the Federal ownership and control of these roads, charging the people only sufficient for freight and passengers to pay the running expenses, keeping the roadbed in repair, and paying the interest on whatever debts might exist against them, together with a reasonable sinking fund to pay off the existing debt, and giving the people the benefit of the lowest possible rates.

The whole nation is clamoring to-day for the building of the Nicaraguan Canal under the control and management of the Government. Upon the same theory and under the existing conditions of these roads, I would like to see the experiment tried of this Government owning and controlling one transcontinental railroad from the Pacific to the Atlantic Seaboard. Such a railroad would tend to regulate the rates of all transcontinental railroads, and might successfully solve one of the most difficult and complex questions that now confront the American people.

To the extent that the right of way is conferred upon railroad corporations it is a delegation of sovereignty, and such delegations are always dangerous. They are not amenable to all the laws concerning corporations. The courts make them a class unto themselves on the ground that they are quasi public corporations. It must be admitted that this quasi public character has operated in favor of the railroad companies and not of the public.

So universal has this idea become that railroads are operated against the interests of the people that it is notorious that in the courts American juries will mulc railroad companies in the heaviest damages possible. Every attorney who represents a railroad company has had frequent cause to complain of the prejudice existing against that class of corporations. The American people love justice. In no country do juries bring in as fair verdicts as a rule as in the United States. The love of Americans for fair play is proverbial. Bankers, manufacturers, merchants, are all accorded justice by juries, and the fact that railroad companies alone encounter as an obstacle to the obtaining of their legal rights a universal prejudice is proof conclusive that the people have suffered at their hands. And among such offenders the Pacific railroad companies have never been backward. They have oppressed the farmers by extortionate charges, by insufficient service, and by granting low rates to favored shippers until the fertile country through which their lines pass is almost ruined. The farms are mortgaged, corn is burned for fuel, and wheat and fruit rot because they will not bring a price that will pay for shipment to market. That I am telling the truth will be borne out by every man familiar with our Western States. This has caused, more than everyything else combined, the spirit of unrest that is found throughout that section. Throughout the States where these railroad lines pass there has been for years a general demand that the Government control. Now Congress has an opportunity, without incurring a dollar of extra expense, to allow the experiment to be tried in the very section where the demand for it is strongest.

It would in the past have saved the $324,000,000 paid in dividends by these same roads, even though they had not been conducted more honestly than these companies operated the lines. That saving to the producers along these roads would have rendered them independent and prosperous. Their farms would not now be so heavily mortgaged and they be suffering for the necessities of life. If the experiment proved a failure, the railroads could be sold. It will cost nothing to try it, and it will settle one way or other this widespread popular demand. It will not do to predict a failure ex cathedra. It is successful in Europe and has never been tried in the United States. It is true that Illinois, Indiana, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and Georgia have tried it in a very limited way. It has not been altogether satisfactory nor altogether unsatisfactory, but there are difficulties in the way of a State operating a railroad that do not exist as against the United States, for the States can not regulate shipments from or into other States.

In this case the people furnished the money, and I believe they have a right to demand that they, through their Government, shall have control of the property, at least till this debt is paid.

I therefore oppose any funding scheme, believing that the Attorney-General should act in accordance with the terms of the act of 1887 and buy in the property for the people.

act of 1887 and buy in the property for the people.

But if any funding bill is passed, certainly the arrangement should be the best one possible. It is admitted that the Union Pacific can afford to offer better terms than the Central, and here is what Creed Haymond, attorney of the latter company, stated his company could do:

The company could without any difficulty, and without assuming a burden nearly as great as is now upon it for interest, pay into the United States Treasury four millions annually, which would pay off the last dollar of this indebtedness long before the expiration of forty years. This indebtedness could be made to constitute a mortgage upon the property, and it would be a first mortgage readily available to the Government or to any person who desired to use the security.

If Congress is to act at all, it should only do so after a thorough examination of all the facts and the law and equities of the case. We have nothing before us but the reports of the committee, of which there are three, all of them stating the facts differently, and the bill reported, leaving the facts for the Secretary of the Treasury to learn. If the members of the committee who heard the evidence can not agree upon a statement as to the facts substantiated, how can those members who did not hear the evidence base any conclusion upon these reports? We know that the Central and Union Pacific Railroad companies will owe the United States Government some money—as to how much, we have different statements. We know that no effort has been made by the law officers to collect it. We are informed by the debtors that they are insolvent, but we do not know that this is true, while we do know that they have not always been truthful in the past. We have no schedule of assets and liabilities that would be accepted by any court as such, or acted upon in any creditor's meeting.

We know from the reports of the Pacific railroads commission in 1887, the Wilson commission in 1873, the reports of the Government directors of the Pacific railroads each year for the past twenty years, and the messages of Presidents Harrison and Cleveland, that extensive frauds have been charged; that it is claimed there have been diversions of funds; that immense sums have been paid to stockholders, and that the companies are charged with gross violations of the provisions of their charters. We are told that there is not enough property to pay the first-mortgage bondholders and the United States, too, but there is no sworn statement or appraisal of the property. We have no evidence that there is not enough, except the statement of the debtors them-selves. Taking for granted that this is true; going further, and taking it for granted that there is not more than enough property to pay the first-mortgage liens, as a matter of law, there are still some important questions to consider. What is the value of the equities? That is a matter a statute-making body can not inquire into properly or reach. It can be determined only by the judiciary. It is a well-settled principle of law that the statute of limitations does not run against the Government; hence a judicial inquiry would probe the frauds, if any existed, and every commission ever appointed has charged that extensive frauds were perpetrated. These frauds must have been to the injury of the United States, and the courts would follow all funds diverted by fraud and give judgment for their recovery. Pass this bill and we condone these alleged frauds without a legal investigation, cut off the possibility of reaching them in the future, give the railroads a clean record up to the date of its passage, and hereafter we must be governed by the provisions of this bill alone. These companies had practically no money except that furnished by the United States. Does this create a resulting trust in favor of the United States in all property purchased with money belonging to the United States? It is a well-settled principle of equity that where property is bought with funds of another, the title being taken in the name of the purchaser, the owner of the funds has a resulting trust in the property so purchased. Is this a case within that rule? If so, every dollar of the Government money can be recovered. Has there ever been an attempt made to bring this case within this well-

An attempt was made to hold the stockholders of the Central Pacific liable under the California statute. This failed, the United States Supreme Court holding that they were not liable under that statute because it was a Federal and not a State corporation. That being true, the liability of the stockholders is under the Federal law. What is that law? The statutes being silent, would not the common law prevail, and the stockholders be liable under the common law? If the common-law liability could be enforced, every dollar of the indebtedness to the United States could be re-Has there been any attempt to enforce it? None whatcovered. ever. Should the courts hold that either of these principles applied, the debt could be collected in full, even though there was not a dollar's worth of property available under direct legal proceedings.

In connection with foreclosure proceedings, a bill of discovery could be filed, setting forth the allegations of fraud that have been made. Congressional committees have tried in vain to get the made. Congressional committees have tried in vain to get the books, or information as to what they contained. If a subpoena duces tecum is not powerful enough to bring them forth, a writ of sequestration, coupled with the authority of the courts to imprison for contempt, would secure the evidence. The hearing before Congressional committees has largely been ex parte. We have only the evidence of the defendants. We know nothing about the strength of our own side of the case. There is not a about the strength of our own side of the case. There is not a lawyer in this body who would risk his legal reputation by writing a legal opinion upon the intricate legal and equitable questions involved with the confused and conflicting statements of facts before us for consideration. According to the provisions of this bill, even the amount of liabilities to be assumed is left for the Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain after the bill has passed.

If the decision of the court was against the United States on all of these points, no fraud was proved, no funds had been diverted, and the stockholders were not liable, we would be in no worse position than we are now. We could still fund the debt if thought best. It may be feared that the present foreclosure suits would be pushed and not await the action of Congress. Making the parties to the present suits party defendants will hold them in court; and if the judgment be adverse to the United States, and the Government does not want to purches the property and the the Government does not want to purchase the property, and the first-mortgage bondholders refuse to wait until Congress acts, a suit for the annulment of the charter, for which there is ample ground if reports are true, will bring the first-mortgage bond-holders to terms at once. Let us have a judicial determination of the facts, a schedule of assets and liabilities, with proper appraise-ments, a determination of the questions of law and equity; then we will have information upon which we can act intelligently. Until then, theories and opinions are absolutely valueless, for we know nothing about the case.

Let us go into the courts, where the stockholders, the unsecured creditors, the bondholders, the Government, all, can be heard. Let us have a decision upon the merits of the case. Let us probe the charges of fraud to the bottom. Let us recover the funds that have been diverted, if any. Let us determine whether the stockholders, who have grown enormously wealthy, can not be made to account for a portion of their dividends. I believe we will collect all of our money. If not, we will be in no worse position than promise before their debt is due, that they are afraid of the courts; promise before their debt is due, that they are afraid of the courts; but the United States has nothing to fear from its judiciary. If, as they claim, they have nothing to pay with as corporations, and are not individually liable, why should they object to legal investigation? Is it purely and wholly a proposition for their advantage, and only a plan to induce the Government to pay their debts and allow them to continue in control of the property? If it is, Congress has no right to consider such a proposition for a moment. If not, it is inexplicable that they should keep up an expensive lobby in order to prevent the present law from being carried out. While I am opposed to this funding bill, I can see how others might be earnestly in favor of funding this debt. But I can not see how any member of this House can favor funding at a rate of interest below the actual cost to the Government of carrying the interest below the actual cost to the Government of carrying the debt. Nor can I see how any member can favor taking action until the courts have passed upon the important questions involved, with all parties in interest in court. When that is done, the conclusions can be entered upon the records as a decree of Nor can I see how any member can favor taking action court, all creditors and parties in interest would be bound by it, and Congress would know just what the Government's rights are and what the companies could afford to do. I believe that the strongest friends of this bill will vote against it if they give careful consideration to the lack of definite facts and of judicial interpretation upon which we can act.

Are we justified in overruling these commissions and Congresses when every political convention and every mass meeting of citizens that has acted upon the subject has indorsed what they have done? Let me beg of the members of this House to remember that we are considering the question of collecting a debt. It has already been placed in the hands of the Attorney-General for collection, and he has not reported that it is uncollectible. We do not know whether or not the holders of the senior liens will bid enough to enable us to realize something upon our claims. We do not know whether or not other bidders can be secured. We only know that if we do not resort to legal proceedings our debtors, who, it is claimed, have persistently defrauded us in the past, agree to continue in control, provided we pay their preferred Two Congresses have favored compelling the collection of the debt; two commissions have reported against both the insolvency and good faith of our debtors; three Congresses have refused to entertain similar offers of compromise to that made now. The conduct of these debtors in the past has not been such as to command our confidence that they will carry out even the as to command our confidence that they will carry out even the liberal provisions of this bill. They have strained every point in former enactments against the Government and have grown rich. While they have amassed fabulous fortunes by the liber-ality of the Government toward them in the past, they have studiously avoided making preparation against this day of settlement.

Let us now deal with them as with an ordinary individual under similar circumstances. Let the law take its course. Let exact justice be done to all, and we shall have done our duty.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio addressed the committee. See Appen-

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio is a member of the Committee on the Pacific Railroads, and I ask that he have a few moments more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Ohio may be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MAGUIRE. I object. The extensions have always been

Mr. MAGUIRE. I object. The extensions have always been made to those in favor of this bill.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, in behalf of the people of the United States, and in behalf of the Government, although not authorized so to do by any Government official, I protest against the passage of this indefensible bill. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WATSON] has said that this was a controversy between the State of California and the Government of the United States. I say, gentlemen, that this is rather a controversy between the people and their Government on the one hand and certain railroad men on the other. Show the report of any Governtain railroad men on the other. Show the report of any Government director of the Union Pacific Railway in favor of this new him a question?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I certainly can not yield, as I have only five minutes.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. The Government commissioners get 18,000 a year, and this bill abolishes their office.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Show me the advocacy by any member of the Cabinet of the measure now before us for consideration. No gentleman can accuse me in this place of being an enemy of capital; no one can say that I have ever led a raid against a corporation, or have ever made an attack upon corporate investments; but because I believe in dealing just as fairly with a corporation as with a partnership or an individual, I do not propose to consent to the lending of the money of the people of the United States to an insolvent corporation, to a corporation as to which it is admitted that it can not pay its debts to-day; and yet, forsooth, they ask us now to lend our money—not ours, but the money of the people—$112,000,000 for nearly a century to come.

I say advisedly, after careful examination of every provision of this bill, that it is the worst, most reckless, and most improvident measure, in so far as the people and the Government are concerned, that has ever been offered to the Congress of the United States. Look at the report. I would that I had time to criticise its singular language. Let me point out to you, gentlemen, that it is claimed by the chairman of the committee, the distinguished gentleman from Vermont, that it is a great merit on the part of these railroad companies that the aggregate sum of the repayments heretofore made amounts to nearly the sum originally lent. these railroad companies that the aggregate sum of the repayments heretofore made amounts to nearly the sum originally lent. Is it so in Vermont that the aggregate sum of interest on any loan can not, within a given number of years, equal the principal? Yet this partial payment of interest by these companies is considered so meritorious that three times within three successive pages it is urged in behalf of the passage of this measure.

The gentleman tells us that we have additional security. He tells us that the Omaha Bridge is a new security. Was the distinguished chairman of the committee ignorant of the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States had decided in the case of the Union Pacific Bailroad Company against Hall in 91 United of the Union Pacific Railroad Company against Hall in 91 United States that that bridge formed an essential part of the Union Pacific Railroad, and that the railroad started from the Iowa side of the river?

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman if the Omaha Bridge or the terminals received any aid?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. POWERS. I ask that the gentleman be allowed five minutes more

Mr. ARNOLD of Pennsylvania. I object.
Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have read this report carefully. For ten years I have been familiar with this question, and have heard many debates on various bills introduced touching the settlement of this indebtedness. I almost have by rote the speeches of the gentleman from California, for I have heard them many times on several bills.

many times on several bills.

Now, sir, it seems to me that, from the practical standpoint, this matter is in a nutshell. People ahead of the Government have a lien on these roads for $64,000,000, which is due, so that they can foreclose. The Government has $112,000,000 (in round numbers) due it, subject to this prior claim of $64,000,000. The debt to the Government also is substantially due, so that we can foreclose. By a law now on the statute book, in the act of 1887, there goes from the Treasury, in the absence of new legislation, $64,000,000 to pay off that first mortgage, so that we shall have $64,000,000 more "blown in," and then, if there is no further legislation in the meantime, foreclosure comes.

Mr. TERRY. Is not the gentleman in error in saying that the first mortgage is due and can be foreclosed?

Mr. CANNON. I am not. Now, Mr. Chairman, I undertake to state that in my judgment if these roads were put up to-day and sold under the hammer, nobody would come forward with the $64,000,000, the amount of the first mortgage. Therefore I am for legislation; first, because I do not want $64,000,000 more to go out of the Treasury.

The gentleman from California is against legislation because he does want the money to go out of the Treasury.

of the Treasury. The gentleman from California is against legislation because he does want the money to go out of the Treasury, hoping and believing that the Government will take the road and operate it. I would rather that the railroad should sink a thousand feet deep than that the Government should undertake to own and operate it. [Applause.] But gentlemen say we get only 2 per cent interest. We have an unsecured debt of $112,000,000, and the precedition is that the Courtage Pacific Pailroad the property. cent interest. We have an unsecured debt of $112,000,000, and the proposition is that the Central Pacific Railroad, the moment this act passes, shall advance $2,500,000 in money as an evidence of good faith. Gentlemen may say that is nothing. Well, it is $2,500,000 that we have not got now and that we will have then. [Laughter.] We shall be $2,500,000 better off then than we are before we pass this bill. The interest thereafter is to be 2 per cent. There is also a payment of $1,000 a day from each of these roads for ten years, and if there is a default in that payment there is power in the Government to declare the whole debt due at once. With two and a half millions paid down we shall have that much additional security that we shall have the whole debt raid. With additional security that we shall have the whole debt paid. additional security that we shall have the whole debt paid. With the first year's interest paid and twice $365,000, our security will be so much better. During the second and the third and the fourth years, and all the while, our security grows better. The gentleman says the rate of interest is too small. My only fear about this bill has been as to whether or no these companies will or can comply with this legislation if we enact it. That is my only fear. The gentleman compounds the interest at 2 per cent to show what we shall lose if we pass this bill. Well, gentlemen understand what compounding interest means understand what compounding interest means.
[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, in view of the controversy Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, in view of the controversy which arose a few moments ago between the chairman of the committee [Mr. Powers] and the gentleman from California [Mr. HILBORN], relative to the property of the Central Pacific Company not being embraced in the pending bill, I feel it my duty as a member of the committee, notwithstanding the fact that I am opposing and shall continue to oppose the report of the majority of the committee, to say that in view of the evidence which came before the committee I must substantiate the statement of the chairman of the committee; and I would add that if the gentleman from California had the information which he states he now has when he appeared before the committee which he did do that he did he appeared before the committee, which he did do, that he did not treat the committee properly in failing then to furnish the information which he now states he has.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. Chairman, more than thirty-two years ago this Government loaned to the Central Pacific and the Union Pacific Railroad companies a sum of money. From that day to this a portion of that money has been owing to the Government by these corporations. The business that we have in hand to-day by these corporations. The business that we have in hand to-day is to devise some means by which the Government can get its money back. All of this talk about the rascality of these people, all of this talk about their unfair dealing with the Government, may or may not be true. In the condition with which we are confronted to-day the question that presents itself to us is, How can we get back for the people of the United States the money that these corporations have received from the Government? That is the practical question which concerns us, it is the practical question that concerns the Committee on the Pacific Railroads, and it is the question with which we have been dealing roads, and it is the question with which we have been dealing during these many years.

We have taken up these matters in committee and have heard people from all sections of the country for and against the propositions submitted. We have made earnest, faithful, and honest efforts to arrive at the very best possible solution of the problem. We come here now and present the bill which is the result of our examination and deliberation.

But the gentleman from California [Mr. Maguire] says that we propose to extend to this corporation the privilege of owing this debt for eighty-six years. Now, I ask you gentlemen to deal fairly with us in considering this proposition. I think you ought to treat us fairly; I believe we have tried to be fair with you and with the country.

I ask you to take this bill which we have presented to you and read it for yourselves and see whether the gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE] can legitimately draw such a conclusion as will justify him in making the statement he has made before this House, that this debt is extended for eighty-six years. Take the bill, gentlemen, and read it. It provides that on the 1st day of next labely what? That these companies shall begin to discharge the July—what? That these companies shall begin to discharge the principal of this debt; that they shall pay at the rate of $1,000 a day for the first ten years that the debt runs and pay up the interest every six months. So that upon an average at the end of about forty-seven years this debt and interest will be extinguished. That is the provision of the bill. That is not my statement. It is the statement of the bill, the gentleman from California to the contrary notwithstanding. Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. MAGUIRE. Can the gentleman show any statement in the bill that this debt is to be extinguished at the end of forty-seven

Mr. KYLE. No. I say that is the average; which, if the gentleman will figure it out, he will find is the fact. If he makes the calculation he will reach the same conclusion I have reached.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I have figured the average at fifty-five years.

Mr. KYLE. Then not eighty-six years, as you stated a while

Mr. MAGUIRE. Eighty-six years is the total.
Mr. KYLE. I do not want to be interrupted.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Eighty-six years is the total—
Mr. KYLE. I do not want to be interrupted.
Mr. MAGUIRE. Eighty-six years is the total period; the average is fifty-five years.
Mr. KYLE. Now, gentlemen, you have that proposition. The Government begins to get its money at the end of six months. A portion of it is paid during the first ten years, at the rate of $365,000 a year; during the next decade payments are to be made at the rate of $750,000 a year; and so on until all the debt has been extinguished. And gentlemen should remember that these companies, under the provisions of the bill, are required to pay every cent of interest every six months; if they fail to do so—if they fail for six months to pay the principal or the interest of the debt—this bill provides that the whole of this indebtedness shall be considered as due; and in that case the Government officials are charged with the duty of proceeding to collect and enforce the lien provided for in this bill.

Now, why do we fix the interest at 2 per cent? Why, gentle-

Now, why do we fix the interest at 2 per cent? Why, gentlemen, for the best reason in the world. I do not suppose there is any lawyer in this House who has not during some period of his life had to deal with an insolvent debtor. What do good business sense and good business principles suggest in that sort of a case?

Why, to do the very best you can. Suppose we exact more from these people than they are able to pay, and thus break them down? The result is, we simply destroy one of the great arteries of com-

The result is, we simply destroy one of the great arteries of commerce in this country and put ourselves in such a position that we can not realize our debt.

The committee carefully took into consideration the income of those roads. We had men before us to testify as to their income; we had documentary evidence before the committee. As men who, I believe, were trying to deal honestly with the proposition, we took it up and, after considering the ability of those companies to pay, we concluded that 2 per cent was all that their earnings would permit them to pay. How else than from their earnings can the companies pay this money? What is the use of requiring more than they can pay? Is it sensible to exact of them an impossibility—something that they can not accomplish?

Besides the provisions for payment of the bonds that will be due

Besides the provisions for payment of the bonds that will be due the Government under this bill, I call attention to the fact that there are now in the Treasury of the United States, to the credit of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, known as the sinking fund provided under what is known as the Thurman Act, $15,825,985.63, and to the credit of the Central Pacific, under the provisions of the same act, $6,493,126.94. In addition to this, there is a sinking fund to the credit of the Southern Pacific of $2,409,818.20, over which the Government has no control so far as power to appropriate to the payment of its debt. All these sums are to be applied to the Government debt against these roads, and then the remainder is to be paid as I have before stated.

* [Here the hammer fell.]
Mr. BELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I had not expected to detain the committee again, but I desire now to repeat and indorse particularly what has been so well said by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Harrison]. The gentleman from California [Mr. Hilborn] is certainly mistaken in the position he has taken, and, I understand, has been misled by a telegram received from some person, who it is I do not know. I would have said something more on the same subject, but the very full and accurate statement of the gentleman from Alabama has covered the ground thoroughly.

But there are one or two other things to which I wish to call the attention of the committee. It has been assumed by the gentleman from Ilwa, by the gentleman from Illinois, and various other gen-tlemen who have addressed the committee, that we have no secur-ity at all for our debt against the Pacific roads. That is an entire ity at all for our debt against the Pacific roads. That is an entire misapprehension of the facts. Why, sir, the debt which is secured by the mortgage which has precedence over the Government debt, leaving out of consideration the question as to whether we have a lien on any of the property excepting that part with reference to which there is no dispute—that debt only amounts to an average of about $22,000 a mile. There is hardly a railroad in the United States that is not mortgaged for more than that. We have in the State in which I live, and in that section of country, which is not so populous as that traversed by portions of the Union Pacific line, various railroads, some of which are mortgaged to the extent of $48,000 or $50,000 a mile. Nobody questions the fact that they can collect that much out of their security.

Our mortgage covers 1,442 miles of the road, and about that there is no dispute, and the amount of the mortgage which is ahead of ours is $33,000,000, or about $22,000 a mile. Another thing that is worthy of consideration is that that portion of the road on which we have unquestionably a lien runs through and traverses the most densely populated section of the entire country through which the line passes. If they had to get the right of way again through eastern Kansas and Nebraska, through such cities as Topeka and many other magnificent towns along the line of the road, it would cost them for the right of way alone, over a portion of the road at least, as much as $22,000 a mile, without taking into consideration the question of the cost of construction.

We may be treating with an insolvent creditor, but we are not treating with a creditor against whom we can not collect at least a portion, and a large portion, of what is due to us by a lawsuit. That is the fundamental mistake into which the advocates of the bill fall. If we insist on our right, and, if necessary, if we resort to foreclosure proceedings under the act of 1887, we can get possession of the road and sell to some other company for fifty or sixty thousand dollars a mile.

So, Mr. Chairman, I repeat, that we are going to confer a great favor by the plan proposed. I know that if the road is sold at forced sale, and no condition attached, it would not bring more than one-half of our debt in addition to the debt secured by the first mortgage. But in order to induce men to put into the enterprise their own private means, and thereby to increase our security, we propose to extend to them the use of money for a long time at an extremely low rate of interest, and if we will only stand firmly for our rights we will save our Government a large amount of Another thing to which I wish to call the attention of the com-I occupy pretty much the same attitude with reference to the funding bill as does the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER]. But there are some things in his remarks which I fear might lead some to vote against any kind of settlement. There is an impression which has gained currency that we have a legal remedy against the men who accumulated the fortunes, as we understand they have, out of these roads. If we had such a we inderstand they have, out or these roads. If we had such a remedy, I would be in favor of losing half of our debt in order to recover what they owe rather than to allow them to enjoy their ill-gotten gains. But I assert, as a lawyer who is perfectly willing to risk what reputation he has, if he has any, upon the statement, that there is not the least chance under the sun to get one dime's handle for the Covernment at the end of a lawsuit against such that there is not the least chance under the sun to get one dime's benefit for the Government at the end of a lawsuit against such parties. The Government of the United States can not maintain such a suit. It is simply a creditor of the company, and the directors of the company, if they have diverted any of the funds of the company or have defrauded anybody, have defrauded the company itself, not the United States, and the company alone has the right of action. This cause of action was barred years ago. The committee has considered that point fully, and a subcommittee submitted the question to the Attorney-General, who gave an opinion in accordance with the statement I have made. The only effect of such questions as this is to obscure the real issue and perhaps prevent us from effecting a settlement which issue and perhaps prevent us from effecting a settlement which may save us millions of dollars. In fact—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I agree with those gentlemen who advocate the passage of this bill that the real question before us is how we can save to the public Treasury this one hundred and eleven or twelve millions of dollars due to the Government from these roads; but I do not agree with them when they say that it is a matter of no consequence that the men who received the money from the sale of the bonds which we loaned these companies and expended it, made themselves rich through the dishonest and fraudulent practices with which they are charged.

I can not, for instance, agree with my friend the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Hepburn] in his statement that if these men became rich it was from the rise of the securities which they received honestly received, as he would have us understand-in the construction of the road.

Mr. Chairman, I can not agree to this when I find on page 143 of the report of the Pacific Railroad Commission, which I hold in my hand, that there were large sums paid for improper purposes, to wit, $263,812.08 on account of the Sioux City and Pacific Railway, which went improperly for the benefit of the directors of that On account also of constructing 1,171 miles of feeders to the Central Pacific, Stanford, Huntington, Hopkins, and Crocker issued to themselves $33,722,000 of bonds and $49,005,800 of stock, when the cost of these adjunct lines was but $27,216,931.01, thereby leaving a clean steal on this alone of $55,509,554. Then as directors of the Central Pacific they took a lease of these lines which they owned, at a rental of nearly 13 per cent.

How can I agree with my friend when I read further in said report as follows:

Fifteen months ago three of these directors contracted with themselves to build an extension of the California and Oregon division of the Central Pacific from Delta to the boundary line of Oregon, a distance of 105 miles. In payment they issued stock to the amount of $8,500,000 and bonds to the amount of $8,500,000, the market value of the stocks and bonds at that time being $8,340,000. The actual cost of construction was $3,505,600, so that they personally profited by their own votes by that single transaction to the extent of $4,834,391. Mark Hopkins is dead, but his interest is still maintained for his estate and heirs.

The summary of the stealings from the Central Pacific is presented by the commission in the following language:

In following up the dealings of the Central Pacific Railway directors with the adjunct companies it is found that Messrs. Stanford, Huntington, Hopkins, and Crocker received over $142,000,000 in cash and securities. And in addition to this sum of $142,000,000 they also made large profits in the operation of fifteen or more companies which were directly or remotely sapping the revenues of the Central Pacific Company.

How can I agree with my friend from Iowa when I turn to page 107 of this report and find the provision contained in the charters of these companies that no stock was to be issued until fully paid up in cash, and then read the following findings of the commission; that more than $60,000,000 of the stock of the Union Pacific was issued, but only $9,000,000 paid in cash; of the Kansas Pacific stock $9,000,000 was issued, and not a cent paid; of the Western Pacific $7,900,000 in stock was issued and only $200,000 paid; of the Central Pacific $68,000,000 stock was issued and only $7,000,000 paid in upon it; and of the Sioux City Pacific there were $4,260,000 of stock and only $1,894,000 paid—a total of over $139,000,000 of stock issued, and but $18,094,000 paid into the treasuries of these different companies. Then when I turn to page 51 of this report, and find that the total profit of construction of the Union Pacific was $43,000,000, as this commission figured it, giving the items and spreading them before us, which sum included $1,104,000 on account of the Credit Mobilier, how can I agree with my esteemed friend that these gentlemen became rich from the rise in the securities which they legitimately received? They really stole themselves rich and stole these roads poor. Nor can I agree with my friend and colleague, the gentleman in charge of this bill [Mr. Powers], when he says it is none of our business how much these men cheated other people if they did not cheat the Government.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that it is not impertinent on the part of the American Congress to have a care that a corporation created by it be kept clean and honest, not only in its transactions with the Government but with all men. Why, these railroads are the children of Congress: they are our children if you please: created by it be kept clean and honest, not only in its transactions with the Government but with all men. Why, these railroads are the children of Congress; they are our children, if you please; and can it be said that because our children have not cheated us it is none of our business that they cheat everybody else?

But the trouble is, Mr. Chairman, these men have cheated us. You will recall how, after they went away with their charters for these roads granted in 1862, and started the construction of them, they came back in 1864 and said they were not provided with money.

they came back in 1864 and said they were not provided with money enough to build the roads, that the stock and bonds were not suffi-cient in amount, when in fact they were more than sufficient only for the grand larceny of these men. They said, in short, that they for the grand larceny of these men. They said, in short, that they must have another mortgage equal to the amount of the Government loan, and that it must be a first mortgage and the Government mortgage made second. And, Mr. Chairman, you will remember, astounding as the fact now seems, how, through the legerdemain of the Credit Mobilier, the stock of which was held by legerdemain of the Credit Mobilier, the stock of which was held by many a Member and Senator, whom it followed like a shadow to the grave, these men hoodwinked and wheedled the American Congress into making the Government mortgage a second mortgage and allowing them to sell, as a first mortgage, an amount of bonds equal to those loaned by the Government, and then they went to work and stole every dollar of that first mortgage and two or three times as much more. So I say, Mr. Chairman, they have cheated us.

They also cheated the Government at the same time by falsely representing that the Sioux City road could not be built on a straight line from Sioux City to the North Platte, according to the original charter, and obtained permission to build on a circuitous route at very much greater cost and to the inconvenience and great damage of the whole Northwest, but to the advantage of a connecting railway, which was in the conspiracy.

By this line, as fraudulently built, after one had gone 79 miles from Sioux City on his way to San Francisco he would actually be more than 20 miles farther east than when he started.

Not only this, but when they defaulted in payment of interest—that is, the Union Pacific—I believe the Central Pacific has not defaulted

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.
Mr. BARHAM. I ask that the gentleman have five minutes in

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman have five minutes in addition. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, when they defaulted in the payment of interest any lawyer would suppose that possession of the road could be taken by foreclosure proceedings, and the Attorney-General so supposed, and instituted suit for that purpose. But, when the Government got to the Supreme Court, it was discovered that the gilded hand of the Credit Mobilier had so shaped the act of 1864 that the Government could not foreclose in default of interest alone, but must wait till the debt itself fell due. None of the principal fell due till January 1, 1896.

And here a word in reply to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Henderson], who said the Government had confessed its inability to deal with this subject by not having already taken action. The fact is the Government could not take action. There was not a dollar of the principal due till January 1, 1896, and under the decision already referred to nothing could be done till the debt itself matured.

Since then they have been awaiting the action of Congress, and very properly, only a year.

Now, Mr. Chairman, after having been held up for thirty-five years, the Government has at last got where it can put its hand on this corporation; where it can foreclose its mortgage. And now these gentlemen and their successors and representatives appear upon the scene again and ask Congress to forget the falsehoods and frauds and robberies that have been committed by them during the thirty-five years they have kept the Government out of this debt. They ask not only this, but also ask the Government to tie its hands as to this debt again, and this time for eighty-six years and at 2 per cent interest. In other words, they ask the Government to hire money at 4 per cent and let to them at 2 per cent. Why, the loss to the Government in interest alone on this transaction would amount to as much or more than the whole debt at the present time. My colleague said in his speech presenting this matter that the Government had its choice, to accept this bill or throw the debt away.

If the bill is accepted, the debt would be absolutely thrown away through the loss on the interest item alone. But, Mr. Chairman, the debt will not be lost should this bill fail. It could only be lost on the ground that the first mortgage could foreclose and shut out the Government mortgage. But this can not be done till Congress gives permission to be made a party to the suit.

Sovereignty does not allow itself to be sued, does not allow itself to be taken into court by a dapper constable or a deputy marshal with a writ of summons except by permission of Congress, and that permission has not taken marshal. If you will look at the Attorney-General's report for 1896, you will find the Department of Justice stands upon this ground. The Government can not, without further legislation, be foreclosed out of its rights in this property. Of course the first mortgage must be paid first, and property. Of course the first mortgage must be paid first, and whether in the hands of a receiver as now, or however it may be administered, that must be paid before anything can go to the Government. But the advocates of this bill say it will give us a mortgage on additional lines of railway. Mr. Chairman, in my opinion the Government is better off with the security it now has than it will be with that proposed by this bill; and if power could than it will be with that proposed by this bill; and if power could be vested in somebody to settle, as proposed by the substitute bill of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Harrison], I believe it would result much more profitably for the Government than to pass this bill. The fact is, little if any additional security would be obtained by extending the mortgage over the unaided portions, while the first mortgage would be increased, if this bill passes, by the amount of $24,000,000. This is well illustrated by the Kansas and amount of $24,000,000. This is well illustrated by the Kansas Pacific, on which we have a mortgage now to the three hundred and ninety-fourth milepost. This is really a valuable piece of road, every rod of it runing through a rich and productive country. Between that point and Denver the road goes through an alkali region practically worthless. That portion on which we now have our mortgage will always be a valuable property, made so by the fertility of the country. But the other part is worth nothing only for its connections. And so it is throughout the whole system. It is by no means clear that we shall not lessen, rather than increase our security by passing this bill It is by no means clear that we shall not lessen, rather than increase, our security by passing this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I make the point of order that debate is closed on this amendment, and demand a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, the only amendment offered was an amendment to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment is a motion to strike out the last word.

strike out the last word.

Mr. DOCKERY. I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is withdrawn, and there is no pending amendment. The gentleman from Massachusetts

Mr. KNOX. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that we are engaged in passing one of the most important bills of this session or we are engaged in a mere idle discussion which will amount to nothing but boys' play, and be utterly futile. Now, the question of whether we shall succeed in this important business and pass something usewe shall succeed in this important business and pass something useful, in my opinion depends more than anything else upon whether we shall pass a bill that some corporation or some body of men with sufficient money, capable and willing to take hold of this road and run it and provide the payments, principal and interest, required by the bill may accept. The estimate of the committee is that the net earnings of this road properly applicable to the fixed charges are only $4,000,000. We know that at the present time of railroad competition a road must be kept up—new rails must be laid, rolling stock repaired and kept in condition; and the real question is expressed in the thought put forward by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cannon]. Is there a corporation, is there a body of men now that are willing to take this road for the first mortgage bonded indebtedness and the subsidy indebtedness to the Government and pay the annual payments? That is, then, the question. then, the question.

There is a large opinion in this House that this rate of interest should be larger; that it should be 3 per cent. But, Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to concede that everyone on that committee was as anxious to obtain the highest rate possible for the Government as any one of us. They have looked into this matter, and have said that all that can be provided and paid is 2 per cent. and have said that all that can be provided and paid is 2 per cent. I am willing to take their statement, and trust and believe that there will be some corporation or some body of men that will take this road and pay the Government indebtedness. But, Mr. Chairman, there are other parties interested in the road besides the bondholders. There are unsecured creditors. There are poor stockholders. Is the State of California the only State that has suffered by the Union Pacific Railroad? Have not the people of New England and New York and the East generally honestly invested their money in the securities of these roads, without guile and fairly, money honestly earned? Have not hundreds of millions of dollars of the people of New England gone into this road, and other like roads, where the money was honestly acquired, the fortunes of widows and of orphans? Would it be an objection to this bill that there is in it some hope, some remote hope, that in the years that are to come, the eighty years or the fifty-five years that are to pass while this indebtedness is being paid, and at the end of that time, there may be something left of the wreck; that there may be some little substance to be gathered in of the great fortunes and the great amount of money that have gone into this road that has helped to develop the country of the people that are now objecting to this bill?

Why, the gentleman from California said that the first scheme in respect to the Union Pacific was to have it end nowhere, and then have a company to get terminal facilities and rent to the Union Pacific. That was not the first time that game has been played. That has been played for New England people over and over again, and it has been played over and over again in the railroads of the West; and if the officers of the Western railroads that have intentionally cheated and defrauded the American people had their just deserts, the penitentiaries would have to be enlarged. There is no way to punish a crime that has been committed by laws passed after the offense. The money has been lost. We can not legislate for ourselves. We must legislate here for the Government; and this, it seems to me, is not only the best chance, but it is the last chance. What will be the prospects of another Congress? Will the President allow the time to elapse between this time and another Congress before a foreclosure?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Chair desires to recognize somebody in the affirmative.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Chairman, I have listened intently and with great interest to the debate in the House on this bill, and one fact seems to me not to have been stated as clearly and briefly as it might have been, namely, a comparison between the reduction Why, the gentleman from California said that the first scheme it might have been, namely, a comparison between the reduction the Government will suffer, the reduction the first-mortgage bondholders will suffer, and the tax put on the stockholders by the assessment on the stock of the Union Pacific Railroad.

assessment on the stock of the Union Pacific Railroad.

Under the reorganization plan and the proposed bill the security of the Government is cut down 2 per cent, and therefore it is contended that the Government is the only party that is to suffer by this measure, but as I understand the case, the stockholders are to be assessed $15 or $16 a share on the stock of the Union Pacific Company, which stock is now selling for about $9 a share, and the first-mortgage bondholders in this road, whose interest now runs from 5 to 6, 7, and 8 per cent, are to have their interest cut down to 4 per cent, so that the interest of the first lienors in this property is reduced one-third, and the stockholders are taxed by assessment over 150 per cent of the present value of the stock.

I have made these few remarks simply to bring these facts to

I have made these few remarks simply to bring these facts to the attention of this committee, as they do not seem to have been brought out clearly during the course of the debate. There is one other point which seems to me to have misled some

There is one other point which seems to me to have misled some gentlemen here. There seems to be an impression that the stockholders are to receive 4 per cent per annum. Now, as I understand the provisions of this bill, the stockholders are limited to 4 per cent; but the earnings of the roads, judging from the past, do not indicate that there is any chance for a long time and for many years to come for the stockholders to get 4 per cent, or, in fact, to get anything in the way of a dividend

The following figures show the proposed reduction in the interest on the first-mortgage bonds:

That is, about one-third loss to first-mortgage bondholders. Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, on the day of the opening of this debate I called the attention of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Pacific Railroads to the Sioux City and Pacific branch. I have been unable to ascertain that any consideration of that road was given by the committee in the formation of this bill. Now, I am not concerned here to day with what may be alleged as to the wrongdoings of the men who constructed these Pacific roads originally, but I am here to assert that this Congress has to do with its own wrongdoings, and that it should correct them so far as possible at this time. The Sioux City and Pacific Railroad, a branch intended for the development of the northern part of the United States, was originally authorized to run from Sioux City southwesterly to a junction with the Union Pacific Railroad; but upon reports made, fraudulent reports, alleging that a road could not be constructed in that direction by reason of the proximity of the Black Hills, on the Missouri River, although the Black Hills were 500 miles away, the route was changed. In fact, it is as easy to construct a railroad southwesterly from Sioux City as it would be to construct one across these Capitol grounds eastward. Upon those false reports the road was diverted by act of Congress down the bottom of the Missouri to a point now called California Junction, and then west to Fremont, 2 or 3 miles west of the starting point.

Now, it has been proposed to this committee that so far as pos-

Now, it has been proposed to this committee that so far as possible that robbery of the people of the Northwest should be corrected; but the committee has refused to consider that proposition. I submitted the other day, for the information of the House, an amendment, which was printed in the Record, and which was designed, so far as possible at this date, to correct the wrong done to that portion of the country; but I am informed by the chairman of the Pacific Roads Committee that the committee will fight man of the Pacific Roads Committee that the committee will fight that amendment, and therefore I have to announce that I shall not offer it. I was induced to propose that amendment very largely by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa—the amendment known as the Hepburn amendment—which entirely destroys all right or opportunity to construct a road on that line and gain any advantage from the connection.

Now, this Sioux City and Pacific road, as originally projected, was intended to serve the great interests of that northwestern country—a line coming down from St. Paul, the Sioux City and St. Paul, and the St. Paul and Sioux City, the McGregor and Missouri River, the Dubuque and Sioux City—great lines coming in like the fingers of a hand to get connection with the Union in like the fingers of a hand to get connection with the Union Pacific. All that region has been robbed of its rights by an act of Congress, and we are to-day invited to confirm that wrong; and I am here to enter my protest against it in the name of the people of that great northwestern country. At the city in which I live steps have already been taken, with a view, trusting to the justice of Congress, to build that line on the original survey, or at least in that direction, without any expense to the Government of the United States, and my own city has contributed $320,000 to the enterprise. A bridge has been built there at a cost of a million dollars, and now Congress refuses to consider the application of those people. Whether California has been wronged or not, it is for California to say, but the Northwest has been denied the privileges which were granted to it under the original act, and this Committee on Pacific Railroads is deaf to any appeal for redress. [Applause.]

[Applause.]
Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the time of my friend from Iowa be extended for two minutes, as I would like to ask— Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I object, Mr. Chairman, because I did not receive any courtesy from that side.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. Chairman, there is a tiny plant springing up from out of the bosom of mother earth with peculiar characteristics. Toy with it and it will sting you; clasp it and it is harmless.

As a coordinate branch of the Government, we are confronted with a duty that requires no toying with, else it may sting us, to our vain regret. We are not responsible for the conditions antedating this matter. Criminations and recriminations are usaless in this condition. Whatever peculation or frauds have existed we are not responsible for; but for the performance of our duty we are responsible; we must meet that duty as men. in this condition.

It is necessary that something be done with this question. have before us here the fruits of the labors of a committee. formulating our views and opinions upon these matters of legislation we must defer to the action of committees established for our guidance. They receive the subject in the committee room, digest and analyze it, and give us the results of their investigation; and we must accept them. We must accord to the members of the committee patriotism and intelligence in all their actions and findings. In view of that fact, confronted as we are with such responsibility, I accept it as an individual, and I trust that those with whom I am associated will not let passion or prejudice or misconceived ideas of what has been done in the past thwart them in the performance of their duty now to go ahead, grasp the situation, accept the fruits of the committee's report (made after a painstaking investigation), and settle for this Government a vexed question which has been a thorn in our flesh for so long a time. Under these circumstances and in accordance with the findings of the committee, I shall support in toto the bill as reported from the Committee on the Pacific Railroads, conscientiously believing it

Committee on the Pacific Railroads, conscientiously believing it to be the best solution that can be satisfactorily accomplished.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman, I rise simply to correct the statement of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT], who brought into this discussion the Credit Mobilier. The mortgage of the United States on these roads was changed from a first to a second mortgage by Congress two years before the Credit Mobilier ever came into existence. The Credit Mobilier, of which we have heard so much, had nothing in the world to do with the changing of that mortgage from first to second. It was done because the syndicate that was expected to raise the money to construct the road said that if was expected to raise the money to construct the road said that if the Government would make its mortgage a second lien, thus taking the risk of the enterprise, they would put in the rest of the money for its construction. But they would not invest their money in second lien if their lien was to come after the Government's first mortgage. So much for that.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are dealing to-day with the living, not with the dead. It is a third of a century since this enterprise began. Most of those who took part in its inception have passed from the scene of action. New men and new interests have arisen; new investments have been made. The House of Representatives sit here to-day in a double capacity. In the first place, we represent a junior creditor of an insolvent corporation. That creditor is the people of the United States. There is no question, I take is the people of the United States. There is no question, I take it, for us to settle outside of this one proposition: Representing a claim against an insolvent corporation—insolvent because it can not pay its fixed charges—how is that corporation to be reorgan-

In all reorganizations of railroads, the first question coming up between the senior and the junior creditors, if there are sacrifices between the senior and the junior creditors, if there are sacrifices to be made, is, Which have received the greater advantage from the enterprise? And if there are sacrifices to be made, the party that has received the greatest advantages is expected to make most of the sacrifices. Here the great question is as to reducing in rate of interest. The first-mortgage bondholders are to receive 4 per cent on their mortgage. That is fair and all that can be asked. The junior mortgage bore 6 per cent. The only question is as to reducing the interest to 2 per cent. But can this insolvent debtor of ours pay any more? The representatives of the junior creditor themselves have selected a committee to examine that question and that committee reports that 2 per cent is as large a question, and that committee reports that 2 per cent is as large a rate as the net earnings of this debtor will warrant it in paying. Now, sir, if a board of directors representing any railroad in the United States were considering the question of reorganization, and in a question between junior and senior creditors, the junior creditor should refuse to enter into an arrangement after receiving the greater advantage from the enterprise which his own committee recommended, is there a man here who would say that his conduct was honorable and fair? I would take care, if I were dealing with such a man individually, that I had the most ample security for any money that I might loan him.

The junior creditor in this case is the people of the United States. They have received greater advantage from this road than any-body else. They have received a far greater amount of money than the amount of their debt in money saved on the transportation of Indian supplies, munitions of war, troops, and expenses of Indian Nothing ends Indian outbreaks and threatened warfare more quickly than a locomotive passing over the Indian country. Are we any worse off if we accept the report of the committee, a committee selected by ourselves, representing the junior creditor? If a junior creditor is not to take the report of the committee selected by himself, I would like to know what fairness there is in business or money transactions of this kind? It is our committee that has made the report; and we represent the junior creditor here. Is each man to undertake to settle this matter for himself after he has selected a committee to do this business, and then give as an excuse for rejecting their action that he has not had time to examine the question?

Mr. Chairman, what do we get under this arrangement? As the committee has reported, and as everybody agrees, we get a lien of the same amount as now on a large number of miles of unaided railroad to which the same considerations for Government business apply as on the aided lines. The amount of the Government's ness apply as on the aided lines. The amount of the Government's business would apply on our debt. If we should allow the mortgage to be foreclosed and the property sold, the Government would be obliged to pay cash for all its transportation over all these lines. If the companies succeed in paying their indebtedness under this arrangement, then the Government, of course, has lost nothing; on the other hand, if there should be a failure, the Government can not be any worse off under the new arrangement than it is now.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BRODERICK. I believe, Mr. Chairman, no amendment is pending to this section.

The CHAIRMAN. No amendment is pending to the first

Mr. BRODERICK. I ask for the reading of the second section. The Clerk proceeded to read the second section, as follows:

The Clerk proceeded to read the second section, as follows:
SEC. 2. That the Union Pacific Railway Company, successor to the Union Pacific Railroad Company and the Kansas Pacific Railway Company, be, and it is hereby, authorized to make, issue, and deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury, who is hereby authorized and directed to receive the same, its certain indenture of mortgage, which shall bear date the 1st day of July, 1897, covering and embracing all the lines of railway, rights of way, terminals, terminal properties, bridges, rolling stock, lines of telegraph, and all the then unsold land grant and other lands, and all the then outstanding land and town lot contracts, and all property appurtenant thereto embraced in and covered by existing mortgages of the Union Pacific Railway Company, including all its unsubsidized as well as subsidized lines of railway and the branches and spurs connected therewith now owned by the Union Pacific Railway Company, the main lines whereof extend from Council Bluffs, in the State of Iowa, to a point about 5 miles west of Ogden, in the State of Utah, and from Kansas City, in the State of Missouri, to Denver, in the State of Colorado, and from Denver to Cheyenne, in the State of Wyoming, and from Leavenworth to Lawrence, in the State of Kansas, together with all appurtenances thereto belonging, and all rights, tranchises, and privileges owned by the Union Pacific Railway Company in connection therewith of with the operation thereof. Said mortgage shall constitute a lien upon said properties junior and subject only to the new first mortgage hereinafter provided for, and shall cover and embrace all the lines of railway, property, tranchises, and rights embraced in and covered by the said first mortgage. A proper and complete description and inventory of all the property affected by such mortgage shall be prepared under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, which, when approved by him, shall be filed in his office; and such mortgage on the property therein described shall be held as securify for the payment of the principal and interest of the bonds issued thereunder and authorized by this act; but this section or such mortgage shall not be construed to prevent the said company from using or disposing of any of its property or assets, in the ordinary, proper, and lawful course of its current business, in good faith and for valuable consideration, and said company may sell and convey for valuable consideration any lands included in its land grant and apply the proceeds thereof as required by the provisions of the new first mortgage hereinafter provided for: Provided, That every such disposition of any stocks, bonds, securities, or other property owned by said company, whether by sale, pledge, or otherwise, shall be reported to the Secretary of the Treasury within thirty days after such disposition has been made, and that the bonds, stocks, obligations, or other property acquired, with the proceeds of the property so disposed of, shall, except as hereinbefore provided, in like manner and with the same power to dispose of the same, be subject to the lien

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit the amendment that I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend on page 5, in line 21, after the word "Treasury," by inserting the following:
"Provided further, That the said Union Pacific Railway Company shall relinquish and abandon any and all claim, right, title, interest, and demand to or in a right of way exceeding 100 feet in width through the lands formerly known as the Delaware and Pottawatomie Indian reservations in the State of Kansas."

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve the point of order on the amendment for the present. I have not looked into it. The CHAIRMAN. The point of order will be considered as

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Chairman, under an early statute enacted in Kansas by the Kansas Territorial legislature organizing the Leavenworth, Pawnee and Western Railroad, which afterwards was merged into and became a part of the Union Pacific, 400 feet in width was allowed as a right of way through the two Indian reservations named, and by the statute incorporating the Union Pacific road that amount was allowed along the entire line or lines. But the act of Congress was amended by a subsequent statute. The Territorial statute has never been modified, and this has raised the question. The owners of land along the Union Pacific Railroad through the Delaware and Pottawatomie Union Pacific Railroad through the Delaware and Pottawatomne reservations, a distance of nearly a hundred miles, have fenced their lands up to within 50 feet of the roadbed on either side. There has been no claim on the part of the railroad company until recently for this 400 feet of right of way.

But a few years ago, some four or five years past, I believe, there was some claim asserted in a suit pending and prosecuted in the court of Kanson. The court of majority of the indees—held the courts of Kansas. The court—a majority of the judges—held that the railroad company had abandoned its claim to the land and that the statute of limitations would run against the railroad claim. But it was intimated by one of the judges that the United States Government had an interest in the road, and because of this possibly the statute of limitations would not run. however, never asserted any further claim, but allowed the owners on either side to inclose the lands, as I have said, to within 50 feet of the road.

The bill reported two years ago by Mr. Reilly contained the substance of the amendment I have submitted. It was omitted, however, in this bill. I simply ask that the provision of the Reilly bill regarding this right of way be inserted in this one. It does not take from the road any property. The road is not using this 400 feet and it does not need it; does not even claim it as a matter of fact, but if it ever does assert a right of possession it will be as a matter of speculation on their part and not because they need it. It is valuable land, and the owners have been in actual possession for twenty-five or thirty years. They are clearly entitled to this land and of right should have this cloud removed and the question settled for all time.

I trust, therefore, that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. FARIS. Mr. Chairman, in the hearings before our committee, when these charges of misdoing and peculation in the early days of the Pacific roads were presented before us and discussed, I confess I felt that infinite injury had been done to and infinite advantage taken of the Government of the United States. I therefore do not wonder, when we have heard recited on this floor the alleged facts in connection with the history of the early days of these roads, that members who are not familiar with this great subject feel their blood warm and their judgment harden against any proposition of settlement.

Why, sir, if we were to listen to the gentlemen opposed to this bill, we would think we were dealing with and considering the first and only simon-pure case of railroad mismanagement in the entire history of the country. But what are the facts? What is the history of our railroad building?

Why, sir, as the mileposts along the routes and the telegraph poles along the rights of way are strewn the wrecks of men, women, and estates who have lost their fortunes in the blunders and crashes attending railroad enterprises promoted by private capital. I am here to admit that in the building of these great properties there were engaged quite human men, whether they properties there were engaged quite human men, whether they had connection with private enterprises or with these quasi public enterprises. There is no question of that.

But what is our situation as it stands to-day? What are the conditions that confront us? It is that the Government of the United States has a claim of about $112,000,000 against the Union and Central Pacific companies, and we are to deal with it in a manner that will probably save it or certainly lose it, according to the judgment of good men.

The distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. Magure]

The distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. Maguire] a while ago said that there was a third mortgage on certain of this a while ago said that there was a third mortgage on certain of this railroad property. I presume his meaning was that it would stand as a bar to the execution of the provisions of this bill in the Government getting a second mortgage. But I call the attention of the distinguished gentleman to the fact that there is a provision in the bill which says that all incumbrances, prior and junior, shall be relieved, and that the first incumbrance now resting upon the road shall rest upon all the property, and that the Government shall have the second lien on all the property, instead of upon a part of it as now. upon a part of it as now.

Mr. MAGUIRE. If the gentleman will allow me to state—
Mr. FARIS. 1 decline to yield.

Mr. MAGUIRE. That is right. That is the way to deal with the question.

Mr. FARIS (continuing). I further note the fact that the distinguished gentleman from one of the Dakotas says that under the provisions of this bill the Government must borrow $61,000,000 at 3 per cent interest, or something like that, and says that that fact alone is a serious objection to the bill. That would be true if the fact existed.

Why, Mr. Chairman, I would not be offensive to the gentleman (and I regret he has left his seat), but from my point of view the proposition is nonsense and misleading. The Government pays no money to execute the provisions of this bill beyond which it is already liable for. The first-mortgage indebtedness already resting on these properties shall continue, and the Government gets a second mortgage on all the property, securing a debt already matured and maturing to the Government. Not a dollar of pub-lic money will be expended to carry out the provisions of this bill beyond the Government's present liability.

Other objections that have been mentioned might be disposed of, but, as you know, it is impossible to go into details in such matters in five minutes of time.

Mr. Chairman, where should we expect wholesome public sentiment on a proposition of this kind? Would it come from California—which has stood here solidly for years opposing every proposition of settlement—when it is known that every member from California who would dare come here and favor any plan of settlement would that instant, and by that act, meet his political destruction? I mention this not to reflect on those able gentlemen, but to suggest they are not safe leaders in this case. Why, sir, I have the San Francisco Examiner of December 10, 1896, commenting on the President's message.

It savs:

President Cleveland has declared that he will use the power granted him by the act of 1887 to secure the Government's interest in regard to the Union Pacific if the funding bill or other instruction does not come from Congress by that date. While no threat is made in regard to the Central Pacific, a defeat of the funding bill will probably result in the same action toward that

The fight of California is cut out for her. The object of battle is to defeat action on the funding blil.

There is no need to divide the anti-Huntington forces at this day with a discussion of the proper way of disposing of the roads. That question can be settled when the Government gets them. The thing to do now is to let the law take its course.

This indicates a purpose and hope that legal proceedings would result in the Government obtaining the properties, a purpose and hope indulged alone by some people of the Pacific Coast and by the Populist party of the country.

I have the New York Tribune of December 8, 1896, which editorially comments on this bill as follows:

It is now pretty generally understood that the opposition to any and all plans for revising the relations of the Government with the roads so as to secure their safe continuance comes solely from a small number of Popocrats in both Houses, whose ultimate purpose it is to bring about Government control and management of the roads. That consummation seems to them so desirable that they are quite willing the Government should lose the entire debt, if necessary, in order to effect it. From recent utterances of the San Francisco Call, as well as from other evidences, it would appear that our fellow-citizens in California are somewhat stirred up over this matter. They are apparently anxious to have the Government own and operate railroads on its own account, and especially anxious that the experiment should begin in their own State with the confiscation of the Central Pacific. The reason for their solicitude is not difficult to discover, but the advantage of such an experiment to the rest of the country is by no means so clear. The sale of these roads under foreclosure would, it is true, settle the question of their indebt-edness for good and all; but what would the Government have to show for it? The Government lien is forestalled by the first mortgages, which must be paid before any of the purchase money received from the sale can be applied to the payment of that lien. The roads were constructed in war times, when the prices of labor and materials were abnormally high, and it is stated on the authority of those who are best fitted to form an intelligent judgment that the properties would not sell for more than would satisfy the first mortgages. Assuming that this unbiased judgment, based upon careful consideration of the subject, after years of the most searching investigation into the financial affairs of those companies, is correct, the result of a sale under foreclosure would pay the first-mortgage bondholders and leave practically nothing for the Government.

The people of California may view such a prospect with complacency, counting the loss of a hundred millions as the merest trifle so long as they lose nothing, but hope to reap some advantage by it. * * They insist that the Government ought to take these roads and operate them largely for the benefit of California. This might be an excellent thing to do-for California—but the Pacific railroads are growing properties, and they can earn, beyond any doubt, sufficient to pay the Government

I also quote the following from an editorial in the Indianapolis Journal of Saturday, December 26, 1896, which I submit reflects the unbiased judgment of the people of Indiana, who are equally interested with those of other States in this great public question:

interested with those of other States in this great public question:

The question—and now it is an imperative one, as the bonds are falling due—is whether the Government will treat the important matter from a business point of view. The owners of the Pacific reads owe the Government a large sum of money, principal and interest. Business men, under such circumstances, would seek an adjustment upon a basis which would give the creditors the best security attainable and at the same time leave the debtor in a position to meet his obligations. The history of the construction and management of the roads is not a factor in the problem, because there is nothing in them that can be utilized. It can not help the settlement to denounce the managers, since if that could have promoted settlement it would have been accomplished years ago. * * * The plan proposed and approved by the best men in both branches of Congress is to accept a funding scheme which will substitute a low-rate bond for the obligations of the roads to the Government, embracing a plan for the gradual extinction of the debt.

Here is the opinion of a leading newspaper of the great Central ernment, embracing a plan for the gradual extinction of the debt.

Here is the opinion of a leading newspaper of the great Central West, equally removed from railroad manipulators of the far East and from railroad haters of the far West. Mr. Chairman, let this question be divested of personal animosities, of studied malice, and be invested, as your committee has endeavored to do, with consideration for the public interest, and this bill affords a rational solution of this great question.

The CHAIRMAN, Debate on this amendment is exhausted. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas.

from Kansas

Mr. BARHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last

Mr. POWERS. By an arrangement with the gentleman from Kansas he has consented to hold this amendment a little while, until we can consider its effect.

The CHAIRMAN. That can only be done by unanimous consent or by an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. POWERS. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. BARHAM. Mr. Chairman, I moved to strike out the last word before the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Powers] made

Mr. POWERS. I want to give the gentleman [Mr. Barham] an opportunity to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. Bar-

HAM] is recognized.

Mr. BARHAM. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that the Examiner used all of its efforts to defeat me for a seat in this Congress and the next.

Mr. FARIS. I am glad it did not succeed.

Mr. BARHAM. Well, I do not know about that. Now, I want to call the attention of the committee to a dispatch which I have received from the governor of California, notifying me of the action of the legislature of that State. It is as follows:

SACRAMENTO, CAL., January 7, 1897.

Hon. John A. Barham,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The following joint resolution was this day adopted by the California leg-

Assembly joint resolution No. 6 (substitute for assembly joint resolutions Nos. I and 2).

Whereas there is now pending in Congress a measure known as the Powers-Gear bill, which has for its object the refunding of the debts of certain Governmut-aided railroads; and Whereas any scheme for refunding the Pacific railroads' indebtedness to the United States Government, or any extension of the time for payment of the same, must result in maintaining an excessive capitalization of these roads, thus requiring high rates of fares and freights to get the interest payments thereon, to the great burden and disadvantage of the people of the State of California: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the assembly of the State of California (the senate concurring). That we are unalterably opposed to any and all extensions of the time for payment of said debts, and also the Powers-Gear bill or any other bill of like import, and we hereby instruct our Senators and request our Representatives in Congress to oppose, by all honorable means, the enactment of any such measure.

sentatives in Congress to oppose, by all honorable means, the enactment of any such measure.

And be it further resolved, That we favor the immediate collection of said debts, or in the event that the same can not be collected, then we urge the enforcement of existing laws of the United States concerning the question.

And be it further resolved, That we petition in behalf of the State of California for a hearing before the respective committees of Congress having jurisdiction of the subject, and the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States are hereby further petitioned to recommit the measure now under consideration, and delay final action thereon until such hearing can be had:

Be it further resolved, That the governor be requested to immediately transmit by telegraph a copy of these resolutions to our Congressional delegation at Washington.

Assembly Chamber, Sacramento, January 7, 1897.

ASSEMBLY CHAMBER, Sacramento, January 7, 1897.

Thereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of assembly joint resolution No. 6, as adopted by the assembly on the 5th day of January, 1897.

S. J. DUCKWORTH, Chief Clerk, JAMES H. BUDD, Governor of California.

The California delegation, as I understand, are not now, and never were, in favor of governmental ownership of these roads or any roads. So far as I am concerned, I disclaim any such purpose.

I want to call the attention of the committee to a remark made yesterday by the gentleman who is in charge of the bill.

Mr. HILBORN. I hope that the gentleman will deny the statement made vesterday that we were all intimidated.

Mr. BARHAM. Oh, everybody knows that a Californian is never intimidated by anything—the Examiner; or anything else.

Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman who has charge of this bill said yesterday—and I deem it of most importance in this inquiry, as to whether we have a mortgage lien or a statutory lien upon the terminals—he said yesterday, in a statement to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCall], that the section to which the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Boatner] referred had been directly passed upon by the Supreme Court, and that the Supreme Court had held in that case that our statutory lien or mortgage did not extend to the terminals.

Now, I challenge that statement. If the gentleman ever read the opinion, he knows that that is not the effect of the decision. The court, in 118 United States, as the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Powers] knows, passed upon but one question, and that was section 2 of the Thurman Act. It was not upon section 9, as the gentleman undertook to make the committee believe yesterday. What is section 9? It is part of the Thurman Act, drawn by that great constitutional lawyer, who knew all the facts governing this case. Section 9 covers like a blanket all of the property which is referred to in this bill. It was written to cover it all. It covers the Omaha Bridge; it covers all of the terminals, and no man can read section 9 of the Thurman Act without confessing, if he is a lawyer, or if he can understand the English language, that it covers the terminals and all parts of this road. And yet we are told by these gentlemen that we are getting additional security.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BARHAM. I can not be interrupted. If you will give me time I will answer any question you may ask.

Section 9 says:

That all sums of money due the United States from any of these companies respectively, whether payable presently or not, and all sums required to be paid by the United States into the Treasury or into the sinking fund under this act, or under the acts hereinbefore referred to, or otherwise, are hereby declared to be a lien on all of the property, assets, rights, franchises of every description granted or conveyed by the United States to any of said companies, respectively or jointly, and also upon all of the estate and property, real, personal, and mixed, assets, and incomes of said several corporations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARHAM. I ask five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks that his time be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none,

The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARHAM. Mr. Chairman, it appears from section 9 that all the property owned by the Union Pacific or Central Pacific is covered by the Thurman Act; and there can not be the least question in the world about it. Now, the gentleman from Vermont cites 118 United States Reports. All you have got to do in the world, gentlemen, is to read 118 United States to see that that decision is confined solely to section 2. And what is section 2? It provides for compensation for transportation. That is a debt from the Government to the companies, and does not require security, as section 9 does.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Your time has been extended; will you answer a question?

Mr. BARHAM. Certainly.
Mr. WATSON of Ohio. How could the Government get a lien or a mortgage upon this portion of the road which the Government did not assist in building?

Mr. BARHAM. By declaring as was declared in the Thurman

Act. We never had, and have not now, anything but a statutory lien, just as has been declared in this act, and as in the act of 1862. We never had anything but a statutory lien, nothing else; and the gentleman is a lawyer and knows what I say is true.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I do not know anything of the kind.

Mr. BARHAM. Then you do not know much law. [Laughter.] Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I would rather have somebody pass on that who does know some law.

Mr. BARHAM. I am going to pass on it.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Do not you know that the Supreme Court has decided that the only lien the Government has is on the bond-aided portion of the line?

Mr. BARHAM. I am glad the gentleman asked that question.

The Supreme Court of the United States has decided nothing of the kind, under the Thurman Act, on causes of action. If you have read the decisions, you will find that they are upon causes of action that arose before and not under the Thurman Act.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. No, sir; not at all.
Mr. BARHAM. Yes, sir; at all; and if you have read them

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. You seem to speak with a great deal of positivenes

Mr. BARHAM. You seem to be attempting to mislead the House about the matter.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I am not endeavoring to mislead the House. Mr. BARHAM. The great constitutional lawyer, Senator Thurman, drafted this act, and this act has been declared constitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me to ask

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. BARHAM. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Do you not know 118 United States, the case to which you refer, decided that the act of 1878, the Thurman Act, and the act of 1864—

Mr. BARHAM. Are in pari materia.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. In pari materia, to be construed together; and therefore that the lien of the Government only attached to the bond-aided portion of the road.

Mr. BARHAM. They did not decide anything of the kind.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Well, lawyers will disagree.

Mr. BARHAM. They decided just what I have said, that the compensation for transportation—compensation for transportation—

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman from California print in his remarks the opinion in the case of 118 United States? That will test your honesty in what you are saying.

Mr. BARHAM. I hardly think it necessary to print the report in my remarks.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Will you print any part of it in your remarks?

Mr. BARHAM. Will you?
Mr. POWERS. Here it is; will you read it?
Mr. BARHAM. I will if the House will give me time. Is there objection to the time to be taken in reading this report? Mr. POWERS. Wait until somebody objects before you ask

Mr. BARHAM. Now, I say to this House that section 9, to which the gentleman from Vermont referred, is not construed in this opinion; only section 2, which refers to compensation for transportation—over 2,165 miles of leased road which these roads did not own. That was the question under investigation, and which the court determined.

Mr. Chairman, the Government has a plain legal remedy against the stockholders of the bond-aided roads for any deficiency which may exist after sale of the roads on foreclosure.

I call the attention of the House to the fact stated in the report of the United States Pacific Railway Commission at page 140 (Senate Executive Document No. 51, Fiftieth Congress), where it is shown that of the subscribed capital stock only $1,797,350 was paid up, when $97,098,590 should have been paid up. That is, of the subscription to the capital there remains unpaid by the stockholders over $95,000,000.

By section 2 of the act of 1864 the stockholders are required to pay in for the capital stock at the rate of $5 per share every six months, in money, until the same is fully paid in, and that there now remains of the subscribed capital stock $95,000,000 which has never been paid in.

It is an elementary principle of equity that the capital stock of a corporation, whether paid into the treasury of the corporation or retained by the stockholders of the corporation, is a trust fund to which the creditor of the corporation has the first lien and the equitable right to look to and subject it to the payment of his debts.

Thompson on Liability of Stockholders, section 11, says:

This fund (the capital stock) is the stock held out to the public upon the faith of which the company obtains credit.

The Government of the United States is a creditor of the Union Pacific, the Kansas Pacific, Central Branch, and the Central Pacific in the sum of about $112,000,000. Of these companies the stock-holders have only paid $1,797,350, although the amount which should have been paid in by the stockholders is $97,098,590, leaving an unpaid balance of capital stock of over $95,000,000. Now, it is an admitted fact that these companies are notoriously insolvent.

The companies being insolvent, the United States being a credi tor, there is no reason in the world why the stockholders should not pay this trust fund—this $95,000,000—to this Government.

In Adler vs. Milwaukee (13 Wis., 60) the supreme court of Wisconsin said:

It would be contrary to the plainest principle of law and equity, as well as common sense, after having subscribed to the capital stock, to allow the stockholders, through their own or the willful neglect and dishonest practice of its officers, to refuse to pay in unpaid stock to discharge the fair and just debts due from the company.

There is no conflict in the authorities upon this question; all law writers and commentators and all decisions which treat of

It seems that some members have taken the view that the Government, though being a creditor, could not sue the stockholders directly, but must work out its rights through the corporation; that the Government must have the corporation sue its stockholders, or that the Government must sue the corporation, obtain judgment, issue execution, and have it returned nulla bona, and that because of the great lapse of time since the money should have been paid by the stockholders the Government is barred by the statute of limitations.

They are, I submit, in error on all these propositions. It is elementary law—a maxim—that the law never requires the doing of an idle act. The corporations being confessedly insolvent, it is not required that the creditor should be compelled to pursue the idle process of suing the corporation, obtaining judgment, issuing execution, and have it returned unsatisfied.

When a corporation is notoriously insolvent, the remedy against the corporation need not be pursued. The action may be brought by the creditors against the stockholders.

There is no conflict in the authorities upon this question. is an unbroken chain of authorities laying down this rule, besides which it is an elementary principle of common sense. It is so announced in Camden vs. Doremus, 3 How., 515, 533; Terry vs. Tubmab, 92 U. S., 156; Stutz vs. Handy, 41 Fed. Rep., 531; Kimber vs. Bank of Fulton, 49 Ga., 419; 9 Oreg., 200, and in many other authorities. So that there remains no question about the right of the Government to maintain the action directly against the stockholders when the corporation is insolvent.

The next point urged by the advocates of the measure is that the Government is barred by the statute of limitations, and the chairman of the committee upon this question obtained the opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States. The Attorney-Gen-eral gave the committee a written opinion in which he holds that the Government of the United States is barred by limitation from maintaining the action.

The question propounded by the chairman of the committee [Mr. Powers] is whether, if such liability exists, the United States will be barred in any action which might be brought for the enforcement thereof by the statute of limitations which would bar the companies if the actions were brought in their name and behalf. In other words, whether the United States would be entitled to maintain action as creditors of said corporations against its directors and officers which the corporations themselves could not maintain.

The Attorney-General answered in this way:

As the United States would be merely asserting the rights of the companies as assets to be applied to the payment of their creditors, any statute of limitations which would bar the companies would also bar the United States.

This is manifestly erroneous. There is a great mass of authority, without conflict, holding that the United States when asserting rights as a sovereign power is not barred.

In United States vs. Nashville and Chattanooga Railway Company (118 U. S., 125), the United States had taken certain Cherokee bonds, which if at the time the action was brought had been held by the Cherokee helder it would have been head by the Cherokee by the Cherokee holders, it would have been barred by limitation. It is not possible to get a more precise case, one on all fours with the one I am now discussing. The Supreme Court, Justice Gray delivering the opinion, said:

It is settled beyond doubt or controversy, upon the foundation of the great principle of public policy, applicable to all governments alike, which forbids that the public interests should be prejudiced by the negligence of the officers or agents to whose care they are confined, that the United States, asserting rights vested in them as a sovereign Government, are not barred by any statute of limitations unless Congress has clearly manifested its intention that they should be so barred.

Congress has never manifested such intention. It is perfectly apparent that the Attorney-General has fallen into error in his opinion to the committee. It is to be regretted that an official high in office should upon such great questions of public and national importance fall into error against and to the great danger of the public interests.

Yet this only illustrates the necessity of the rule laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States which I have just read,

The great principle of public policy forbids that the public interests should be prejudiced by the negligence of the officers or agents to whose care they are confided.

The committee have, however, recognized the error of the Attorney-General upon this subject in this bill, and have attempted to preserve the rights of the Government upon the question which I present.

It is provided at the end of the bill that-

Nothing herein contained shall be held to deny, exclude, or impair any right or remedy in the premises now existing in favor of the United States.

It is manifest that this provision has no purpose except to mislead. It is perfectly meaningless. What right or remedy is preserved in favor of the United States, and against whom?

served in favor of the United States, and against whom?
Could any court construe that provision as retaining in the United States any right or remedy it now has against a stockholder who has not paid up his capital stock? Clearly not. It does not so provide. Besides which, the Government is extending the debt of the corporations for many years, taking other security, and providing that all liens upon the railroad, the property, and the revenue by virtue of any existing laws "shall cease and determine," and placing $45,000,000 more prior to the Government lien.

Does not anybody know that the doing of these things ipso facto releases the claim against the stockholder? The only result of this provision is to mislead, bewilder, and confuse.

provision is to mislead, bewilder, and confuse.

Is it possible that it can be in good faith claimed that this pretended saving clause can be of any benefit to the United States? Already the question which I present is surrounded and beset with quite enough difficulty without encumbering it with the dead weight which this measure proposes.

But, in answer to all this, it is thought by some that in the case of United States vs. Stanford, recently handed down by the Su-preme Court, the question has been settled against the Government. If gentlemen who have such views will simply read the opinion of the court in that case they will at once see that such is not the case. The point which I have just called the attention of the House to was not involved in that case. The only point decided or involved in that case was as to the liability of a stockholder of the Central Pacific under the constitution and laws of California, that is, the statutory liability is California and the California—that is, the statutory liability in California; and the court held that, the California company having accepted the terms of the acts of Congress, the road became national, and that the liability of the stockholder was no longer governed by the constitution or laws of California.

The laws of California have imposed an additional liability.
The liability of the stockholder to pay the full amount of his subscription is fundamental for the benefit of creditors of the corporation. Our constitution has added a further liability which makes the stockholder liable not only to the extent of his sub-scription to the capital stock, but to whatever remains beyond for scription to the capital stock, but to whatever remains beyond for his proportion of the debt according to the amount of stock which he holds bears to the whole amount of capital stock. That is, although a stockholder may have paid in the full amount of the capital stock for which he subscribed, yet he is liable beyond this for his share of the debt of the corporation, measured by the amount of stock he holds. If he holds one-tenth of the stock, he must pay one-tenth of the debt.

But I say the liability of a stockholder for his subscription to the capital stock is not passed upon in United States as Stanford.

In that case (161 U. S., page 429) the Court holds that the acts of Congress do not impose upon the stockholders a personal responsibility to pay the debts of Central Pacific, but in this connection says:

They (the stockholders) were bound, of course, to make good the amount of their subscriptions; but that being done, their personal responsibility to creditors of the corporate body ceased. (Pollard vs. Bailey, 20 Wall., 520; Terry vs. Little, 101 U. S., 216; 3 Thompson on Corp., sec. 2925, citing other authorities.)

The court then proceeds to show that the stockholders of the Central Pacific are upon equal terms with the Union Pacific, and that their responsibilities are the same. The fact that the Central Pacific is a California corporation does not impose additional liability on its stockholders. And at page 431 the court expressly reserves the question I am presenting, and says:

It should be remembered that the question here is not whether the stock-holders of the California company can be made liable for its debts to the United States arising in some other way than under the Pacific railroad

The court must of necessity refer to the liability of a stock-holder to pay in his subscription to the capital stock. There is no other liability, except the statutory liability under the laws of California, against which the court held in the Stanford case.

I submit that with a cause of action in favor of the Government so apparent, and one which will bring to this Government $95,000,000, the people of this country will not instify Courses in release.

50 apparent, and one which will bring to this Government $90,000,-000, the people of this country will not justify Congress in releasing and in condoning what is claimed to be one of the greatest frauds of this or any other century.

This measure provides for the leasing of the roads which accept the terms of the act

the terms of the act.

This is provided for in section 21. The law as now construed by our courts does not permit one competing road to lease or control another and competing line. This rule has its foundation in public policy, and is intended to prevent monopoly. I think this provision in the bill is the very Pandora's box of evil, and will overturn a principle which has been long established.

The company which accepts the terms of this bill may by express authority lease its railway and property, or any part of it, to a competing road. Our courts, after many long and wearisome contests, have held, and the Supreme Court of the United States contests, have held, and the Supreme Court of the United States has just recently handed down two opinions, one from Kentucky and one from Montana, holding that the leasing of competing lines is illegal and void, being contrary to public policy. This provision will confer upon the accepting roads rights and privileges which no other roads have.

It can not be that this House will change such a salutary rule of existing law in a bill of this nature when the attention of the members is not supposed to be directed to it, and in the nature of things it would not be found in such a bill.

I think a change of such importance should not be considered in a bill of this nature.

Let us inquire for a moment into the result of one competing road leasing another and competing.

Take, as an illustration, one of the involved roads, the Central Pacific, which is now leased to the Southern Pacific. This lease, of course, is void; but see how it has operated upon the income of the Central Pacific.

In 1894 a lease was made for ninety-nine years of the Central to the Southern.

In 1891 the net earnings of the Central were $2,144,000; in 1892, $861,000; in 1893, $784,000; in 1894, the year the lease was made, $144,000; and in 1895, $42,000.

It is inconceivable how the income of a road could be reduced.

from $2,000,000, and inside of four years, to $42,000—that is, the income of 1895 was only one fiftieth part of that of 1891—except by manipulation peculiar to Pacific railroading; and yet this is just what happened, according to the statement of Mr. Tweed, made before the committee who reported this bill.

And this leads to another thought in considering this measure, and that is, that under the Thurman Act in 1891 the Central and that is, that under the Thurman Act, in 1891, the Central Pacific paid in, or should have paid, the percentage on $2,144,000, and in 1895 there was paid in a percentage on $42,000 only. The loss to the Government is apparent.

I submit to the House that if this is only a coincident, it is a coincident that I think the courts should inquire into, and that this, with a mass of similar coincidents, should not be released and condoned without even an inquiry of any nature, but rather to offer a reward for future acts or coincidents of the same nature, offer a reward for future acts or coincidents of the same nature, by expressly providing in this bill that any accepting road under this act may lease its railway and property to a competing line.

Considerable stress is laid upon the fact that the Government should, if it takes the roads, have the feeders and branches.

In the first place, it is apparent that the feeders and branches have been constructed by the earnings of the trunk lines, and at a continuous loss to them. The distribution of earnings between the feeders and the trunk has always been in favor of the feeders, and has taken from the net earnings of the main line and decreased the percentage to the Government under the Thurman Act. These feeders are now and always have been operated at a loss, and as applicable to the aided roads the loss has continually fallen

Many of the so-called feeders have been built as competing lines to roads already built. Some have been built to open up the properties of the stockholders of the trunk lines, and at a loss to it. These branch lines in 1886 had debts to the amount of $48,000,000, with an interest charge of over $3,000,000 a year.

In making returns of net earnings, these companies have never reported the amounts deducted by them for pools, rebates, and discriminations. They have deducted without right over $25,000,000 criminations. They have deducted without right over $25,000,000 for pools, rebates, and discriminations—a loss to this Government of $8,000,000. (Ex. Doc. No. 51, pp. 142, 143.)

The Central and Union Pacific between them have paid over

$4,000,000 to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company to maintain panies, and owns stock in 13 other corporations, including the Union Elevator at Council Bluffs and Union Elevator at Omaha. In addition to all these stocks and bonds, the Union Pacific Company owns coal and other lands valued at over $198,000, and the Laramie Soda Works, worth $64,000.

An examination of the reports of the helping or feeding roads will show a system carried on inconsistent with honesty.

To inflate the capital of the Oregon Short Line, its cost was reported at $29,000,000, while in fact it cost less than $15,000,000. (Ex. Doc. No. 51, p. 173.)

The California and Oregon division of the Central Pacific is reported as costing $8,340,000, when in fact the actual cost of construction was only $3,505,609.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired, and the gentleman from Wyoming is recognized.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, House bill 8189, now under consideration, and commonly known as the "Pacific Railroad funding bill," sets forth in its title, among other things, that it is intended thereby "to provide for the settlement of claims growing out of the issue of bonds to aid in the construction of certain railroads, and to secure the payment of all indebtedness to the United States of certain represents the construction of certain railroads, and to secure the payment of all indebtedness to the railroads, and to secure the payment of all indebtedness to the United States of certain companies therein mentioned."

I am opposed to the passage of this bill, because in my opinion the enactment of its provisions into law would not accomplish the very desirable objects thus set forth, namely:

First. The final settlement of claims growing out of the issue of bonds to aid in the construction of certain railroads.

Second. The payment of all indebtedness to the United States of certain companies therein mentioned.

I think there is no gentleman on the floor of this House but will agree that it is highly desirable and exceedingly important that the questions involved in connection with the Government's relawith the Union Pacific and Central Pacific railways be settled finally and forever, and that it is equally desirable and important that the Government shall receive full returns for the important that the Government shall receive full returns for the debts owing by these roads to the Government. In common, therefore, with probably every member of this House, I would hail with satisfaction any proposition of settlement which would finally and fully dispose of the matter.

When the original acts of 1862 and 1864 were passed, providing for Government aid to certain lines of railway under certain conditions, provisions were then made for payments to the General Government by the companies, which undoubtedly, in the opinion of the framers of that legislation, would be amply sufficient to secure the payment of the interest upon the subsidy bonds and entirely liquidate in due time the principal of those bonds. No better illustration of the seeming impossibility of making provisions in legislation of this character which shall fulfill the expectations of the framers of such legislation could be had than a knowledge of the results of these enactments. For many reasons which I shall not stop to detail, but some of which have caused vast scandal and tended to fasten in the public mind the conviction that no honest effort was being made by those in control of the roads to provide for the payment of either interest or principal on the debt to the Government, the provisions in the original act for the protection of the Government proved utterly inadequate to provide for the payment of the interest on the Government subsidy bonds. The notorious scandals connected with the management of the road and the fact that the Government seemed each year to be placed in a position which gave less and less hope of the ultimate extinction. in a position which gave less and less nope of the ultimate extinc-tion of the debt owed by the roads called forth the Thurman Act of 1878, with its provisions for larger annual payments to the Government by the roads for the liquidation of the principal and interest of their governmental indebtedness and the extension of the Government lien to other properties than those included in the acts of 1862 and 1864. Owing again to numerous causes, the acts of 1862 and 1864. Owing again to numerous causes, among which figured prominently many acts of railway financial manipulation, which have subjected the management of the companies to a vast amount of merited criticism, the bill failed to realize the expectation of its framers, and now we find the Union Pacific and Central Pacific railways in the hands of receivers, confessed bankrupts, defaulters to the Government of the United States for many years' interest, and finally for a part of the principal of their debts, seeking some settlement with the Government and other creditors whereby they may resume operations as solvent railway corporations. tions as solvent railway corporations.

The ambition of the owners of these roads to settle their difficulties and resume operations in the normal manner are praise-worthy and laudable, but, Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, the passage of the bill now pending before this House would only continue for an almost interminable length of time the same unsatisfactory conditions, or even more unsatisfactory conditions than have existed between the roads and the Government in the high rates.

The Union Pacific Railway Company has a proprietary interest in 41 corporations, and owns stocks and bonds in 36 railroad com-embracing the original Union Pacific and Kansas Pacific bondembracing the original Union Pacine and Ransas Pacine cond-aided lines. The State which I have the honor to represent on the floor of this House has within its borders over 500 miles of this road. It is the only line of railway which traverses the southern portion of the State and is the only line which extends entirely across it. On this line of railway are located nearly all of the fowns of any considerable size within the State, and over two-thirds of our population are entirely dependent upon this road as a means of communication and transportation. The country on both sides of the road is wonderfully rich in mineral products—coal in inexhaustible quantities, the precious minerals, iron, copper, soda, and petroleum abound, and are awaiting development. We of Wyoming have been eagerly and anxiously looking forward to the time when the settlement, in some way, of the Government claim upon the road would once more place it in the hands of and under the management of the men who actually own it at a figure approximately measuring the actual value and earning capacity of the road under fair freight and passenger rates. We have felt that so long as this enormous Government debt is hanging over the road as a second mortgage we could not hope for the building and extension of feeders and branches tending to the development of any of our manifold resources, for the reason that the temptation to each successive management was not to develop the country through which the road passed with the view of increasing the value of the property thereby, but simply to get every dollar out of our population are entirely dependent upon this road as a means through which the road passed with the view of increasing the value of the property thereby, but simply to get every dollar out of the road possible to obtain for the benefit of the management and the first-mortgage bondholders, without in any way enhancing the value of the property upon which the Government's lien existed or to pay more than was absolutely required of the Government obligation. "After us the deluge" seems to have been the motto of the gentlemen who have been connected with the road in the past. I do not know but that it is entirely natural that these gentlemen should endeavor to protect their own interests prior to the interests of the Government, but, as I have before stated, some of the means by which this has been accomplished have been, to say the very least, exceedingly questionable.

the means by which this has been accomplished have been, to say the very least, exceedingly questionable.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what we want—what the people at large want; what every succeeding American Congress will thank us for doing—is to forever eliminate this question from American politics and settle it once and for all time, and close up the unsatisfactory copartnership of the Government with these private corporations. Does this bill, in any particular, accomplish this?

The bill provides that for the next ten years the Union Pacific Company shall pay annually to the Government the sum of $365,000 of the principal of its debt, and interest at the rate of 2 per 000 of the principal of its debt, and interest at the rate of 2 per cent; that for the ten years following the company shall pay on the principal of its debt the sum of $550,000 per annum, and thereafter $750,000 annually, on the principal of its indebtedness—a scheme that will delay the final extinction of the Union Pacific debt to a date eighty-three years from now; a settlement, for sooth, which is not consummated until three generations of men shall have passed away, and which provides for the final payment of the debts of the company in the third century of the Republic the debts of the company in the third century of the Republica time so distant and remote that no man can say that there will be any property to levy upon, what shall be the conditions sur-rounding the property, or what will be the value of the road or its earning capacity—a settlement which seems to be founded on the assumption that this company will be in a condition twenty the assumption that this company will be in a condition twenty years hence to pay the Government annually, on the principal of its debt, double what it is now able to pay or will be for the next ten years; a settlement the real test of the success of which would not come for ten or twenty years hence, for the paltry sum proposed to be paid annually for the next ten years on principal and interest would more than be covered by the Government transportation and well acceptants, a settlement that does not settle. portation and mail contracts; a settlement that does not settle, for the reason that we have no means of knowing that the companies now operating these roads, or that may be organized to operate them, will accept these conditions; and, further, for the more important reason that the bill provides that the roads may be thrown upon the Government whenever the company finds it for its interest so to do.

Section 13 of the bill provides that whenever, in the opinion of the President of the United States, it shall be deemed necessary to the protection of the interests and the preservation of the securto the protection of the interests and the preservation of the security of the United States in respect of its lien, mortgage, or other interest in the property, the President shall direct the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem or pay off any paramount lien by paying the sums lawfully due in respect thereof out of the Treasury of the United States, and no man knows at what time in the eighty years during which the settlement shall be pending the President may be called upon to pay off paramount incumbrances, or to what extent he may be forced to do so. It is not entirely clear to my mind what the intent of this section is, for I can not conceive that it gives the Government any further security or any advantage in the collection of its debt further than are conferred by the remainder of the act. I can readily understand, however, that under the provisions of the first part of this section the company might reap a considerable advantage.

Mr. Pierce, who appeared before the Senate and House committees in the interest of the reorganization committee, claimed that under the act of Congress subordinating the Government lien to the first-mortgage bonds the consent of the Government to be sued was involved. Taking this view of the case, it seems to me these world be no question but that these world be no question but the these world be no question but the this section the company world be no question but the this section that company world be no question but the this section that the company world be no question but the this section that the company world be not considerable advantage. to me there would be no question but that these gentlemen would hold that under the provisions of this act the Government could be made a party to a suit in equity for the foreclosure of the first-mortgage bonds. If conditions should arise (and such conditions are by no means impossible) whereby the property of the Union Pacific Railway should be decreased in value to an extent that would jeopardize the interests of the first-mortgage bondholders, and there was any danger that the road under forced sale would not bring the amount of the first-mortgage bonds, by the simple act of failure to pay interest on these first-mortgage bonds a suit could be instituted for the foreclosure, and, under the provisions of this act, the people of the United States would be compelled for the "protection of the interests and the preservation of the security of the United States in respect of its lien" to redeem or otherwise clear off the first-mortgage lien by paying to me there would be no question but that these gentlemen would to redeem or otherwise clear off the first-mortgage lien by paying the "sums lawfully due in respect thereof out of the Treasury of the United States." Really, this is a very clever arrangement, whereby in no event can the first-mortgage bondholders receive whereby in no event can the first-mortgage bondholders receive less than par for their bonds.

The provisions of this bill will not settle the question of the Pacific railways, for the reason, further, that under those provisions there are created, prior and paramount to the Government lien and mortgage, a first mortgage on the Union Pacific lines, amounting to at least the sum of $54,388,000.

amounting to at least the sum of $54,388,000. The present indebtedness of the Union Pacific associated lines on first-mortgage bonds is $33,532,000. Under foreclosure at the present time this sum would be prior to the mortgage to the Government. Under the provisions of this bill the Government allows the sum of $20,656,000 to be made prior to its lien in addition to the amount which now occupies that favored position. In view of allowing this further amount to be placed as a prior lien upon all of the property of the company, the supposition is, from reading the bill, that the Government secures a lien which it does not now have on the unaided portions of the road and certain other property of the company. As to this property, it is claimed. I now have on the unaided portions of the road and certain other property of the company. As to this property, it is claimed, I presume, by those who are advocating the passage of this bill, that it would for the first time become subject to the Government lien under the provisions of this bill. On that point some very good lawyers, among them Senators of the United States, are of the opinion that the so-called Thurman Act of 1878, by the provisions of the United States. visions of section 9, which are as follows

That all sums due to the United States from any of said companies, respectively, whether payable presently or not, and all sums required to be paid to the United States or into the Treasury, or into said sinking fund under this act, or under the acts hereinbefore referred to, or otherwise, are hereby declared to be a lien upon all the property, estate, rights, and franchises of every description granted or conveyed by the United States to any of said companies respectively or jointly, and also upon all estate and property, real, personal, and mixed, assets and income of the said several railroad companies, respectively, from whatever source derived, subject to any lawfully prior and paramount mortgage, lien, or claim thereon—extends the lien of the Government over all of the property owned by the Union Pacific Railway Company. I know that it is contended that the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of the United States against the Central Pacific Railway, of May 10, 1886 (118 U. S. Rep.), is to the effect that the United States has no lien under the Thurman Act other than upon the bond-aided portions of the road and property referred to in the acts under which this road was organized. But it is also the opinion of many able attorneys that that decision does not take up or decide the question as to the extension of the Government's lien for the payment of the principal and interest of the debt owed by the road to the Government's renment. So it appears to be a grave question whether the provisions of this bill, which adds twenty-odd millions of dollars to the debt of the road made prior to the lien of the Government, really adds a dollar's worth of property to the security the Government now has or would have under a foreclosure carried out under the provisions of existing law. On the other hand, it is the opinion of many who are competent to judge of the value of the properties which it is claimed by the advocates of this bill are for the first time made subject to the Government lien that the properties are highly valued at the sum of over $20,000,000, which is by this act made prior to the Government lien, in addition to the amount of the present first mortgage, and that, therefore, even when admitting that these properties are for the first time added to those on which the Government has a lien, the Government does not receive any additional security thereby. It is assuming altogether too much to say that, as a matter of fact, this proposed extension of the Government lien really embraces any property not embraced in the extensions of the Thurman Act, in view of the expressed opinion of eminent lawyers to the contrary, and I therefore insist that that is not a settlement in any sense of the word which increases prior and paramount indebtedness without, with any considerable degree of certainty, furnishing any further

The provisions of this bill, in my opinion, will not settle the question of the Government's unsatisfactory condition in its connection with the Union Pacific Railway, for the very important reason that this bill provides for the payment of the companies' debts to its public and private creditors by starting out with an assumption of an amount of indebtedness largely in excess of the received the property and payable under conditions which real value of the property, and payable under conditions which, in my opinion at least, the company can never meet. It is all very well to say that we insist that the Union Pacific Railway shall pay every dollar of the indebtedness owing to the Government, principal and interest, but it is not carrying out the idea embodied in that statement in good faith to propose or to agree to a so-called settlement the conditions of which, taking into consideration the condition of the property and the business the road is now doing and is likely to do in the future, impose burdens which the management of the road are quite sure to find it impossible or not to the interest of the first-mortgage bondholders to attempt to fulfill. If, as a private individual, you are making a settlement with a creditor who has other debtors having claims prior, antecedent, and paramount to yours, you will first endeavor to ascertain the earning capacity of the property upon which the total indebtedness is a lien, and then arrive at some settlement whereby, under the conditions which prevail, and which to your best understanding and knowledge of the conditions will prevail in the future, and that the property, to the best of your knowledge and belief, under all the circumstances, can, under ordinary conditions, meet accruing obligations. It would be the extreme height of folly to agree to a settlement simply to make a good showing on which the management of the road are quite sure to find it impos folly to agree to a settlement simply to make a good showing on paper, the conditions of which would relieve your creditor to a very considerable extent over a period of years during which human foresight can form a reasonable estimate of the earning capacity of the property, and providing for heavy payments only at a period so distant in time that business foresight and sagacity could not possibly form an estimate of the earning capacity of the property at that time.

We now propose to lighten the burden of the Union Pacific Railway Company in payments to the Government for the next ten way Company in payments to the Government for the next ten years to the amount of about $1,400,000 per annum on principal and interest accounts. Under the requirements of the Thurman Act the company has owed the Government, since the passage of that act, an average amount of $1,468,931 per annum, so that by the provisions of this bill, while claiming to extend the Government lien over a greater amount of property, and which should result in the ability of the company to pay a greater sum per annum, it accepts conditions which places the final payment of the Government indebtedness junior and subsequent to the payment of over twenty millions of the first-mortgage bonds, and at the same time actually reduces the amount of annual payment.

The Government will not receive within the next ten years from the company under the provisions of this bill as much as has been the company under the provisions of this bill as much as has been due it annually for the last seventeen years under the Thurman Act, without taking into account the interest which accrued and should have been received by the Government from the roads on the subsidy bonds during that period. During the next ten years thereafter the Government is to receive $185,000 more per annum thereafter the Government is to receive $185,000 more per annum than for the first ten years in payment on the principal, and at the expiration of ten years more, or beginning at the year 1917, $200,000 more in payment on the principal, or $750,000 per annum. Now, if the Union Pacific Railroad is ever going to be able to pay its indebtedness to the Government, it is my opinion it will be in better position to do so within the next twenty years than at any time in its history thereafter, and if, in the opinion of the framers of this bill, the Union Pacific Company shall not be able in the next ten or twenty years to pay more than the amounts provided under this bill, they confess to the world that in their opinion the company will never be able to meet its Government obligations, for, if they have any grounds on which to base the assumptions, for, if they have any grounds on which to base the assumption that the roads will be in better financial condition in the dim and distant than in the near future, they have not made them known. I submit that there is nothing in the conditions surrounding these properties which gives promise of ability to pay greater amounts to the Government in the third and fourth and fifth decades hereafter than in the next ten or twenty years. In fact, the Union Pacific Railroad has handled more cars and tons of freight at certain periods during the last twelve months than it has ever handled in the same length of time in its history. The next twenty years will witness the development of the mineral next twenty years will witness the development of the mineral and agricultural resources along the line of its road and in the country tributary to it, which will add to the earning capacity of the road, unvexed by reductions in its tonnage by further competing lines. But this same development will in course of time encourage the building of lines which will draw more and more from its territory, and no man can foresee or tell to what extent its business shall be reduced by the narrowing of its territory in that length of time, or to what extent invading lines shall keep down the natural increase in its local business or competing trans continental lines shall share with it the natural increase of through passenger and freight business.

The past twenty years has seen an enormous decrease in the cost of railway construction. It is not probable that the coming twenty years will witness any further great decrease in the cost of construction, but it is a well-known fact that at this time competing lines can be constructed more direct, and therefore shorter, between competing points than the Union Pacific, with lighter grades and at a cost representing but a fraction of the indebted-grades and at a cost representing but a fraction of the indebtedness per mile with which you propose to burden this road by the plan of reorganization now before us.

Taking all these matters into consideration, can any business man believe that there is the slightest probability that the road will be able to earn more and pay more to the Government twenty years from now than at any time in the next two decades? In my opinion, the golden era of the Union Pacific Railroad is to be in the immediate future when the increased prosperity of the country in general, which we confidently hope for and expect, and the development of the territory along its line shall largely increase its present business before further competition shall tend to reduce its proportion of through and local traffic.

I do not know by what process of reasoning the framers of this bill have arrived at the conclusion that the amounts to be paid in the coming years provided therein are all that can be reasona-bly asked of the roads. I presume that they are judging the future bly asked of the roads. I presume that they are judging the future by the ability of the roads to pay in the past; and, taking into con-sideration the fact that the Union Pacific has claimed to be unable to pay the interest on its first-mortgage bonds and pay the Government the amount required by the Thurman Act, how do they expect that the road shall in the immediate future pay an increased interest charge prior to the Government's lien, by reason of the addition of $20,000,000 to its first-mortgage indebtedness, and then, in a dim and uncertain future, which the keenest human foresight can not fathom or explore, pay a largely increased amount of indebtedness per annum?

It seems to me that this bill simply opens up an endless tangle and labyrinth of complications between the Government and the roads; continues a copartnership between the Government and private corporations repugnant to the spirit of our institutions, and, judging from past experience, one in which the Government always gets the worst of the deal.

Let us imagine, if you please, that this bill goes into effect, and that the Union Pacific Company accepts the provisions of this bill, and that for the next ten years the company continues to pay the Government its average yearly stipend of fourteen hundred thousand dollars. Now, it is provided in section 21 of the bill that the companies taking advantage of the bill shall have the cover of construction or extending its reliable to the second of the bill shall have the power of constructing or extending its railway by consolidation, lease, or otherwise, and of leasing its railway and property or parts thereof. I leave to others the discussion of the legal questions involved in the proposition of consolidation and lease and content myself with the single statement that this section confers owers on these railroad companies to consolidate with or lease to competing lines which are contrary to decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, the tenor of the statutes of the United States and of the States of this Union, and menacing the public good and welfare.

That part of the provision which empowers the leasing of the railway or its property or any part thereof, those who are at all familiar with railway management will understand. One of the most prolific sources of injury to railway properties is the power exercised by railway managements to lease portions of their property to other corporations at figures and under conditions which the public has come to recognize as being in the interests of those in immediate control of the railway properties but not in the interest of the general creditors of the road.

Under the provisions of this bill, no matter how much increased shall be the business of the Union Pacific in the next twenty years, no matter how enormous its earnings in the management of its properties might be the Government will receive whether years, no matter how enormous its earnings in the management of its properties might be, the Government will receive only the paltry sum provided for in the bill. You can rest assured that the opportunity to lease certain properties of the road, which might include coal properties which are immensely valuable, would be used in a way that would not leave the apparent earnings of the company large enough to entitle the Government to any further annual payments than are provided for on account of principal and interest in this bill. I do not make this statement because I believe that the Union Pacific Railway will be in the hands of men who will not conduct the affairs of the road within the lines of legitimate management as it is understood in certain railway. of legitimate management, as it is understood in certain railway circles, but because they will exercise their sagacity in the management of affairs, as the interests of those in the control of the road shall dictate, after fulfilling their statutory obligations to the Government. Therefore it does not require any stretch of the imagination to presume that after ten or twenty years, or even sooner, if business judgment shall suggest it, the Union Pacific Railway, having been drained, as it has been in the past, of every possible dollar that can be gotten out of it by high rates and shrewd manipulation of its auxiliary property, shall, by a refusal to pay for six months the accrued interest to the United States, be thrown upon the people of the nation like a Dead Sea apple, with neither flavor nor substance. Then the Government would be called upon to pay not the amount which it would be compelled to pay to-day in order to meet the first mortgage, if its aw fit so to do, but an amount increased to the extent of $20,000,000, or, in other words, to protect its interest in the road by the payment of other words, to protect its interest in the road by the payment of What better position will the Government be in then than it is to-day? It may be in an infinitely worse position, for we do not know when this will occur, and we do not know what the value of these properties will be when it does occur. It might be the case that the road would not be worth a dollar more and not be able to earn a dollar more than the interest on the fifty-five-million-dollar first-mortgage bonds, and then the Government would be in the business of railroading with a vengeance, having purchased a railroad at twice its value. If the Government does not see fit to operate the road at that time, it can sell the same for what the to operate the road at that time, it can sell the same for what the property is worth. If the property sells for more than the $55,000,000, the Government will save the amount of the excess, whatever that might be, and there is no reason to suppose that it would be more—and it might be vastly less—than the excess over the amount of the much smaller present first-mortgage indebtedness of the companies should the road be sold under foreclosure at this time.

I am opposed, Mr. Chairman, to the provisions of this bill, because they do not in any particular materially change the status of the Government in its very unsatisfactory relations with the Union Pacific railways. Some of the astute attorneys for these railroads endeavor to create the impression that the Government has but a very precarious tail hold on the property of the companies at this time. However that may be, we certainly have a grip upon the companies' property firm and solid, although it may be only upon the caudal appendage, and it is my opinion that we should not let go this firm hold upon the brush of the animal with the hope that as it goes fleeting past we may be able to grasn

we should not let go this firm hold upon the brush of the animal with the hope that as it goes fleeting past we may be able to grasp it again, with a probability that our grasp will be very much nearer the end of the brush than formerly.

I am opposed to the bill for the reason that it offers no ray of hope to the people living along the line of the Union Pacific Railway for relief from the very unsatisfactory conditions that have existed there for years past. With our people it is not a matter of so great importance how the Government connection with the Union Pacific Railway shall be settled as that it shall be settled now and for all time. We look upon the darkened vista of the future which this bill seems to open with fear and apprehension. We can not fail to realize that it means the capitalization of a railroad on which we are largely dependent to an extent which We can not fail to realize that it means the capitalization of a railroad on which we are largely dependent to an extent which in our opinion renders it impossible for it to compete in freight and passenger rates with roads now completed, or building, or in contemplation, in our State or adjoining territory. The workingmen of my State—the employees of this road—look with apprehension on a bill which shall give the management the excuse for hension on a bill which shall give the management the excuse for a reduction of wages, on the plea of a vast indebtedness to the Government which must be paid, and I protest most emphatically in the names of the employees of the Union Pacific Railroad, whose interests are jeopardized by the continued unnatural and unsatisfactory relations existing between the railroad and the Government, jeopardized by immense capitalization of the road upon which they are employed, which would almost compel the reduction of wages to bring the net earnings up to an amount sufficient to pay annual fixed charges.

I protest in the name of the business communities which I represent against the provisions of an act which will give an excuse.

resent against the provisions of an act which will give an excuse, nay, even demand, the maintenance of high local rates in order to meet interest charges on a road bonded for nearly twice what it is worth, and possibly double the amount for which it could be duplicated.

protest in the name of common business judgment against a settlement which does not settle, and against a proposition which brings up before us possibilities and probabilities of a long time of litigation, auxiliary legislation, and probable final liquidation, with the Government holding the empty sack.

I can not, in the brief time allotted to me for the discussion of this subject, even suggest legislation to meet the conditions now this subject, even suggest legislation to meet the conditions now confronting us in the settlement with these roads. But I insist that no legislation that could possibly be conceived, or no conditions that under any contingency could arise under existing legislation, could bring about a condition so harmful to the people living along the lines of these roads, so fraught with future dangers and complications, so absolutely unfair to the Government, and, in the long run, so sure to prove unsatisfactory and damag-

as this bill.

If the Government has, by acts of legislation, been placed in a position where it is impossible to recover what it has advanced to these railroads, the sooner we know this the better it will be for the people of the nation, and especially for the people living along the line of the roads. No fear of the possible scaling of the debt owed to the Government should swerve those charged with the duty of legislation or administration from winding up and severing for evermore all connection of the Government and the people of the United States with the bond-aided corporations.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California withdraw his formal amendment?

Mr. BARHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the section just read. I understand from the gentleman from Kansas, who offered an amendment just now, that he will reserve

Kansas, who offered an amendment just how, that it is to the present.

Mr. BRODERICK. The chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Powers], and I have agreed that, if there be no objection on the part of the House, my amendment shall be considered as pending for a short time until he can ascertain whether it will be acceptable or not.

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that my amendment be

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out, in line 5, page 4, to the word "thereof" in line 23, same page, and insert the following: "97, covering and embracing the entire property of said company, as at present consolidated, real, personal, and mixed, including all the rights, titles, and interests of such company in any stock, bonds, or securities, on lines or any branch lines or auxiliary companies in which such company has now any interest, and all radiroads now owned or hereafter acquired or constructed by said Union Pacific Railroad Company and all their franchises, telegraph lines, rolling stock, fixtures, and property of every kind and description, as well as those which it, its successors, or assigns may hereafter acquire.

Mr. PARKER also offered the following:

Strike out in, line 21, page 5, the words "within thirty days after such disposition has been made" and insert "approved by him before such disposition shall be made."

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I am not opposed to a funding bill. I only ask that any funding bill which we shall pass may provide for paying to the Government as much interest as the Government has to pay out—3 per cent interest at least—and that the lien of the Government shall cover all the property of these companies. I told this committee yesterday that the business of companies. I told this committee yesterday that the business of these roads for eight or ten years past, according to information derived from the Railroad Commissioner, shows that they have earned above their other mortgage interest nearly 5 per cent on the whole Government debt. The interest on that other mortgage debt it is proposed to reduce from 6 per cent to 4 per cent. If that be done, there will be over 2 per cent more which could be applied to the Government debt. There is ample security for 4 per cent first mortgages—they should not be blanket mortgages—and for 3 per cent to the Government and for proper sinking funds. But that is only so if all the property reported by the Railroad Commissioner is included in the mortgage.

Now, I have no hesitation in saying that property of the Union

Now, I have no hesitation in saying that property of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, valued by the Railroad Commissioner at $53,000,000, including stocks, bonds, and control of feeders, is left out of the description embraced in the bill. My amendment left out of the description embraced in the bill. My amendment proposes in the first place that the description used in the bill as to the property of the Central Pacific Company shall be used with reference to that of the Union Pacific, and include all property. In the second place, instead of the general provision that the railroad company may dispose of any of its stocks, lands, or other assets or securities in any way that it chooses, provided that such disposition be reported within thirty days to the Treasurer of the United States, my amendment proposes to provide that this shall not be done without the consent of the Treasurer of the United States. This corresponds with the provision always included in This corresponds with the provision always included in cases. When trust mortgages are executed, the trustees States. similar cases. must always consent.

Now, let us see what property this bill proposes shall be made subject to the mortgage in the case of the Union Pacific. Not all its property, but a certain line of road, together with certain land grants. The terminals are stated; and then, describing the property to be covered by the mortgage, the language is:

All property appurtenant thereto embraced in and covered by existing mortgages of the Union Pacific Railway Company.

That is all. What do those mortgages cover? Do they cover stocks and bonds? Those are not mentioned here. Was this difference intentional? I find similar phraseology at the top of page 5:

Shall cover all the lines of railway property, franchises, and rights embraced in and covered by said first mortgages.

Again, in lines 9 and 10 of page 9, I find the same phrase:
All other property embraced in said existing mortgages.
Again, on page 10, lines 11, 12, 13, 24, and 25—I need not read the particular clauses—the language is repeated over and over again, that the new mortgage which the Government is to obtain again, that the new mortgage which the Government is to obtain is not to cover all the property of the company—its stocks, and bonds, and interest, and feeders, and whatever makes up the plant of which we know the income. Instead of that, this mortgage of the Government is to cover only certain parts of that property, carefully described as being included in the existing mortgages of that company. Does that language cover all the property—

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman allow a suggestion?

Mr. POWERS. I see that the gentleman in framing his amendment has followed the text of the original bill, so that the amendment is not applicable to the reprinted bill, in which the lines vary.

Mr. PARKER. But there is no change in the language that I have been reading. It is exactly the same in the bill last printed as in the original print.

Mr. POWERS. The object of my suggestion is to assist the gentleman. His references to lines are wrong when applied to the bill as it is now before us.

Mr. PARKER. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for his suggestion.

[Here the hammer fell.] Mr. POWERS. I ask that the gentleman from New Jersey may

Mr. POWERS. I ask that the gentleman from New Jersey may have a fair opportunity to present his amendment.

Mr. PARKER. I should like to have a few minutes more.

Mr. POWERS. I hope I may be allowed to complete my suggestion to the gentleman. The bill has been reprinted, and in reprinting the numbering of the lines has been changed. The gentleman in drawing his amendment has inadvertently referred to the original bill with the lines as originally numbered. I suggest that he take his amendment and recast it so as to conform to gest that he take his amendment and recast it so as to conform to the present reprint.

Mr. PARKER. I will do so.

Mr. POWERS. If the gentleman will recast the amendment, we shall be glad to examine it and take it into consideration.

Mr. PARKER. I should like a minute or two more if I can have it. I ask unanimous consent to occupy three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. Parker] asks unanimous consent that his time be extended three

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER. I do not know what may have been the intention of the committee in inserting the language that I have read.

We have no valuations of particular parts of the property. We have no statements in the report of the Railroad Commissioner as to the earnings of the different parts of the property. But we do find in the statement of the assets of the Union Pacific Railroad, on page 20 of the report of 1896, a recital of "other stocks and bonds," amounting to forty-seven millions and some odd thousands; and also a reference to "stocks and bonds held in trust for the company," amounting to five millions and some odd thousands

We likewise have a statement of the liabilities of the road. There is under the first mortgage forty millions or more of indebtedness; under the other funded debt forty millions more, and interest in arrears of two and a half millions on each, making $55,000,000 in all. And this bill proposes to place the funded debt at $54,000,000. Therefore, the question arises, What becomes of the other thirty or thirty-five millions? What has become of the other sixty millions (or ninety millions, as stated here by some one) of property on which the other thirty millions of debt is a lien? Why take a mortgage on part of the property instead of all of it? Give a lien on the whole of it, provide that it shall not be released without the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury, or any other persons you may name; fund the existing prior mortgages at 4 per cent instead of 6. Why make them a blanket mortgage? Give the Government 3 per cent interest instead of 2, include the interest in default that the Government has been out of for thirty years, and you will have a funding bill which is still backed by We likewise have a statement of the liabilities of the road.

interest in default that the Government has been out of for thirty years, and you will have a funding bill which is still backed by plenty of property, that is managed by Government directors, and through this extension of the Government indebtedness the whole amount can finally be paid.

And I protest against taking a part of the property and allowing millions and millions to be taken away from the Government lien. I protest against changing the debt to the Government due by these roads into one payable only after eighty years with interest at only 2 per cent. I am for an honest, straightforward funding bill, but I am sorry to say that I can not support the provisions of the pending bill without radical amendment in these regards.

[Here the hammer fell.]
Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Chairman, this proposition can be sustained only on the ground that the Government has an additional security or receives an additional security for the $21,000,000 in the Union Pacific and $24,000,000 in the case of the Central Pacific, which is made a prior lien to the Government lien on the main line of the road.

It seems to me that if the House understood the proposition they would readily concede that this is the very worst bill that was ever presented for the settlement of the obligations of these roads. The proposition is wholly untenable. In the Union Pacific there are 1,822 miles of road, and the Government has a second mort-gage on most of the road, there being a prior lien of $33,000,000. This bill provides to put $21,000,000 ahead of the Government lien, that sum of $21,000,000, as conceded by these gentlemen, being no lien on 1,428 miles of the road.

Now, what is the excuse for putting $21,000,000 to-day, that is not a lien on 1,428 miles of the road, as a mortgage upon the road, and making the Government lien subsequent to it? They do it on the ground that the Government gets additional security for its claim. On what is this additional security based? On the 394 miles of the road westward, to the rights pertaining to the Omaha Bridge, and to the land on which they claim that the Government has no lien to-day.

But, Mr. Chairman, I say that these properties are already mort-gaged to their full value. This is shown by the fact that the securities based on them are selling on the market now at less

But further than that I want to say, and will show it by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, that we have already as much of a mortgage on this property as we will get if this bill shall become a law. By the ninth section of the Thurman Act the lien of the United States and all of the debts due the United States by these roads are extended to all the assets, real and personal, of this road, as well as all of the assets of the Central Pacific and the United Pacific resilrends.

and the Union Pacific railroads.

Now, we have a lien, subject to this $21,000,000 worth of bonds, on the 394 miles of the road, on the Omaha Bridge, and on the land. This bill simply provides for a second mortgage on all this property, subject to the existing claims; and we will give these people the right of putting $21,000,000 of mortgage, prior to ours, on the 1,428 miles of road that they have not a particle of lien on to day.

But let us see what the decisions of the courts are. In 99 United States Reports, the Supreme Court, in the Sinking Fund Case, appropriating the funds of the Omaha Bridge and the assets of the Union Pacific road, decides this question. They hold that the Thurman Act was constitutional; that Congress retained the power to amend the charters of these incorporations; and that Congress had a right to sequestrate the earnings of the Omaha Bridge, and of the entire system of the road, in order to provide for the sinking fund requirement of the act.

The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Powers] cited a case in 118 United States to overthrow the decision in 99 United States Reports. The 99th United States Reports, in the decision of the Supreme Court, sustains the Thurman Act. It said that Congress had the power to prevent the Union Pacific from making contracts had the power to prevent the Union Pacine from making contracts subsequent to that time. The 118th United States sustains the Thurman Act also. It simply said, in passing under the second section of that act, that it applied to the subsidized portion and not to the unsubsidized portion in retaining on the part of the Government the compensation paid for certain services on the road. In the very language of it, on page 238, it says:

The case turns on the true interpretation of this section of the Thurman

Now, the United States gets its lien by the ninth section of the Thurman Act, which says that the United States shall have a lien on all the assets, all the estate, real, personal, and otherwise, of the Union Pacific Company; and consequently these gentlemen do not give us a single additional lien on the terminals, the Omaha Bridge, or the unsubsidized portion of the railroad, but we waive our lien on 1,425 miles of road.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. Parker].

The question being taken, Mr. Parker demanded a division.

Mr. POWERS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I arranged with the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. Parker] to defer this until his groundwart enable he corrected. until his amendment could be corrected.

Mr. PARKER. My amendment is right.

Mr. POWERS. The gentleman acknowledged that it should be

Mr. PARKER. It does not need correction.
Mr. POWERS. I ask that this matter be laid aside temporarily. I am very confident the gentleman has made a clerical error in reference to the numbers of the lines in the bill to which the amendment applies. He thinks he has not. Now, for his own protection he ought to be sure that the amendment is in proper form, at all events. The mistake grows out of the reprint of the

Mr. BRODERICK. Mine takes precedence.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that both amendments of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] were read together when first reported to the committee. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. COOKE of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that this subject seems to my mind so deeply important that it is overpowering. There is here involved a sum of money or property reaching to $112,000,000; and yet the members of this House have not be-fore them any complete report or record upon which they are to judge of this matter. Its intricacy, its extent, and its volume are so great that I confess for my part, though I have gathered much material and have been quite diligent in my researches, I have not been able to obtain all nor nearly all the documents upon which to conduct the studies that I feel it is necessary for me to conduct before I vote upon a question of this magnitude. I call the attention of the methors of this Heure and the received of the conduct before I vote upon a question of this magnitude. I can the attention of the members of this House and the people of the country to the fact that we are sitting here in deliberation upon this great question without having before us a report from any committee of this House, or of the Senate, that even purports to give a list or catalogue of the documents, papers, records, or public proceedings upon which we must necessarily form our judgment. We are necessarily in the dark to a very great extent.

The report made by the majority of the Committee on Pacific Roads in favor of this bill I hold in my hand. It is a mere leaflet, containing only 13 pages. The report of the Senate committee upon this same subject, favoring the adoption of the bill to settle this enormous indebtedness, I hold in my hand. It consists of another leaflet of but 10 pages. There is nowhere in either of these reports, or in any report which I have been able to examine or place my hands upon, a list, a catalogue, anything that would answer to a bibliography of this great and appalling subject. For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I insist that this House is in no condition, and will be in no condition to vote upon this question until it has before it something that it can in self-respect call a record upon which to act. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I would favor the adoption of a resolution something like this, which I now read simply for the information of the House:

simply for the information of the House:

Resolved, That the pending bill be recommitted to the Committee on Pacific Railroads, and that that committee be, and it is hereby, directed to report to the House of Representatives at the earliest practicable moment a list or catalogue of all the public documents and official reports which were made use of or relied upon by said committee in the preparation of the majority report by said Committee on the Pacific Railroads, submitted to the House of Representatives on April 25, 1896 (being H. R. Report No. 1497, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session), with a statement as to each of such documents or reports showing where copies of the same may be obtained, to the end that the House of Representatives may order to be printed such portions as may be unobtainable, and have before it for convenient reference a full list or catalogue of the documents, information, reports, and data which are referred to by said committee in its said report of April 25, 1896, in the following words, to wit:

"Very exhaustive inquiries have been conducted by committees and commissions appointed by Congress into all the facts affecting the relations between the Pacific railroads and the Government, and into the conditions which affect the settlement of their indebtedness. This committee avoid, in the present report, any unnecessary repetition of detailed matters embraced in other familiar and easily accessible reports."

Mr. NORTHWAY. Mr. Chairman, I. do not rise for the pur-

Mr. NORTHWAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of entering into a discussion of the main question. pose of entering into a discussion of the main question. The time is insufficient for that. I barely wish to state some of the reasons which actuate me in the vote which I shall give against the passage of this bill. In voting against the bill, I wish it to be understood that I do not impugn the intelligence, the integrity, the patriotism, or the devotion to the public interest of the Committee on Pacific Railroads in the report that it has submitted to this House. I want to say, however, supplementing the remark of the gentleman who last addressed the committee [Mr. Cooke of Illinois], that while I have attempted to acquaint myself with this subject and have spent nearly all my vacation in the effort, I am compelled to admit that I stand here to-day pretty much a stranger to it, and I do not believe that I impugn the intelligence of any member of this House when I say that very few of us appreciate the com-plexity or the magnitude of the subject with which we are here called upon to deal.

I have been a lawyer and have practiced law for thirty years, I have been a lawyer and have practiced law for thirty years, and I have never seen the day, poor a lawyer as I might be, when I would permit a client of mine to be dictated to by the party on the other side until I fully understood all of my client's case. [Applause.] We stand here acting in behalf of the Government, not in opposition to the debtors of the Government, but for the best interests of the Government itself, and if there is a single gentleman here, outside of the members of the Committee on Pacific Parliance, outside of the members of the Committee on Pacific man here, outside of the members of the Committee on Pacinc Railroads, who dares say that he fully understands all of the facts and all of the evidence so clearly as to entitle him to vote intelligently upon this subject, I would like to see the gentleman and to visit with him, for he can enlighten me. [Laughter.]

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. NORTHWAY. I have not time to answer questions. You have been on the floor a good deal; now let me talk a little.

[Laughter.]

[Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, rather than vote for a bill that I know nothing about, which may compromise the Government's claim to $112,000,000, I will let the Government continue to occupy the position which it holds at present. [Applause.] I do not see any necessity for our running a foot race in the settlement of this business. We occupy a controlling position. No one can force us to act. I do not believe in permitting these debtors of the Government to dictate terms. [Applause.] They have done it for thirty years, but I think it ought to stop. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Patterson], whom I regard highly for his intellect, as equal to any gentleman in this House, an able and patriotic man, stood here yesterday and proposed to put into the hands of the stood here yesterday and proposed to put into the hands of the debtors of the Government a bludgeon with which they can dictate a settlement. He is opposed to foreclosing for fear that we shall have to buy the road. I do not believe that that gentleman, after thinking it over, would make the same speech to-day or would sanction the speech he made yesterday. I want to see this Government stand upon its rights and have all the rights of a creditor, even though that policy does force it to buy those roads. [Applause.]
There is no use in playing the coward and saying to these peo

There is no use in playing the coward and saying to these people, "We will not enforce our rights; now tell us what you will do?" The moment you take that position they will offer you the worst possible terms that they think you will accept. I believe in standing for the rights of the American people in this matter. I believe in saying to these parties, "We will stand upon our rights, even though we should be compelled to take the roads." And I do not see how we can suffer by taking that position any more than we should suffer under this bill, which provides that the President of the United States may, when he thinks proper, cer tify to the Secretary of the Treasury that, in his opinion, the security of the Government has become insufficient, whereupon the Secretary shall be compelled to pay off the prior lien out of the Treasury of the United States. That is the provision of this bill. Now, what is to hinder the owners of this road, if they make this settlement with the Government, from putting the money, as they have done during the last few years, into improvements upon the road, while they default upon the interest on their first-mortgage bonds, thus practically compelling the Government to forego what is due it in order that the amount may be spent to forego what is due it in order that the amount may be spent Another thing. I should like to know why the Government by this bill should permit the stockholders to receive a dividend of 4 per cent on the stock while we accept 2 per cent on the bonds. This road in the course of the next eighty years may become a profitable road, and may be able to earn more than would pay 4 per cent dividends on its stock. But under the provisions of section 17, if the companies earn more than 4 per cent—in other words, if they should earn 6 per cent dividends—they can, after paying 4 per cent, take the other 2 per cent and give us only one-half, thus enabling 5 per cent to be paid upon the stock. I submit that the stockholders ought not to have more than 4 per cent until the obligation of the Government has been paid off. They ought not to be permitted to derive in that way the excess over 4 per cent.

Mr. POWERS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Hubbard] be allowed ten minutes on behalf of the opponents of the bill, and that I, following him, may be allowed the same time to close the debate, which must close, as I understand, at 5 o'clock to-day. This proposition, I believe, is acceptable to both sides.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont asks that the remaining time be divided equally between the gentleman from Missouri and himself.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I object. I want to occupy five minutes

Mr. NORTHWAY. If this debate should proceed until 5 o'clock, will there be then opportunity to offer further amendments to the substitute or to the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.
Mr. NORTHWAY. Then I should like to offer an amendment

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Powers] as to the division of the remaining time?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I object.

Mr. NORTHWAY, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HARRISON], and to have it pending, so that if his amendment should come up to be voted on, mine will be voted upon as an amendment to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Northway] offers an amendment, which will be read, to the substitute of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Harrison]. The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of section 1, after the words "Section 1," and insert the fol-

Strike out all of section 1, after the words "Section 1," and insert the following:

"That a commission consisting of three persons, to be named, one each, by the Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary of the Interior, and Attorney-General, shall be constituted, with full power to settle, adjust, or compromise the indebtedness of any and all of the bond-aided Pacific railroads to the Government of the United States upon such terms and in such manner as may be agreed upon by such road or roads and such commission: Provided, That any and all settlements thus made shall be submitted in writing to the President for his approval or disapproval, and when approved by him shall be binding as a valid agreement."

In lieu of section 4 insert the following:

"Sec. 4. That each of said commissioners shall receive pay at the rate of $30 per day for the time necessarily spent by them as such commissioners, and the sum of $15,000, or so much thereof as may be needed to pay such commissioners and to pay the expenses incident to such settlement and to carry out the provisions of this act, is hereby appropriated out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

The CHAIRMAN. This will be considered pending as an amendment to the substitute of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I did not wish to treat the leaders of the debate on either side with any discourtesy; but after having carefully studied this subject and having prepared a speech, I was very rudely cut off this morning.

The committee in their report say that additional security is The committee in their report say that additional security is given by the Government lien covering unsold lands. If you will examine the bill you will find it especially provided that the lands unsold shall be sold for the benefit of the holders of the first mortgage. So that the security is not additional. In fact, it is of but little value to-day, because, as I am informed, the lands are covered by millions upon millions of land-grant bonds.

The reason I am opposed to any extension of the payment of this debt is that the Government of the United States is in a stronger position to-day with reference to these railroads than it can ever be at any future time. The hour of deliverance, thank God, has at last come. For thirty years the Government of the United States has been powerless to enforce the payment of the interest on its debt. And now it is proposed that instead of a mortgage at 3 or 3½ per cent, the lowest just rate according to the market rate of interest generally when the security is undoubted, we shall scale down the interest, so that by a reduction of 1 or 1½ per cent on the interest the whole of the principal shall be canceled and the Government of the United States shall receive in reality nothing whatever on account of the principal of the debt.

The rights of the United States are conditioned upon the maturity of the bonds. That period has come at last. I believe that if these mortgages are foreclosed that, in so far as the Union Pacific road is concerned, the Government would receive some $46,000,000. That is the whole of its principal and 3½ per cent interest on that principal. But why do Iso believe? I believe it, gentlemen, because the various propositions offered by the Union Pacific in the past show that enough bonds—that is to say bonds of the value of show that enough bonds—that is to say, bonds of the value of forty-seven or forty-eight millions of dollars—would be set aside in their plan of organization with which to provide for the payment of the Government liens. Moreover, it must be borne in any time by any act of Congress, has the United States abandoned its privilege as a sovereign not to be sued by the subject, so that without the Government's consent, without a voluntary appearance in the suit by the Attorney-General on behalf of the United States, no foreclosure by the first-mortgage bondholders can give good title, no plan of reorganization can be efficacious or successful. In other words, before the railroad can be reorganized in ful. In other words, before the railroad can be reorganized it must first settle with the United States by guaranteeing an upset price which shall be satisfactory to the Government, and shall protect sufficiently the lien of the United States.

Now, so far as the Central Pacific is concerned, if you pass this bill you do not benefit the innocent stockholders of that road. Do they come here and ask for legislation? No; it is another corporation. It is the Southern Pacific which desires to throttle the Central Pacific.

Were that road to be sold under foreclosure proceedings, there would of necessity be three or four great bidders for the property. We should have the stockholders of the Central Pacific, we should have the Southern Pacific, we should have the reorganized Union Pacific, and we should probably have the Denver and Rio Grande to bid. So, as a business proposition, the road can be now sold for the best advantage of the Government and the people of the United States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a word further. While I do not believe, as an initial proposition, in the Government ownership of railroads, I do not believe any more in subvention, aid, or subsidy paid by the Government of the United States to the railroads. But this was a great national work, a national undertaking, born of a national necessity, and if to protect our rights—the rights of the people of the United States—we have to buy the lines, I say it will be far better than to fund this debt under the provisions of this bill. We are not to blame for the misfortunes of the past, for any loss thus far entailed upon the United States, but we are responsi ble for any unwise legislation in the present, and we shall be held accountable by the people as their trustees for any loss or damage which may come in the future by reason of the passage of this bill or the enactment of this proposed law.

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Chairman, nothing could be more apparent to this House than that those who have sought to pass this bill have ceased trying to do so on its merits. They have abandoned the merits of the bill, and three weapons only have been used in their discussion to induce members to lend it their support on this floor.

The gentleman from Iowa on yesterday asserted in his observa-tions on the measure a proposition to which I wish to call atten-tion for a moment. He wanted the House to understand that the failure to support this bill possibly meant Government ownership and Government operation of these roads; that is their first weapon. Far be it from me, Mr. Chairman, and other members of the Pacific Railroad Committee who opposed the passage of this measure, to lend our aid in any way, shape, or form to Government ownership or Government operation of railroads. We stand here as representatives of the Government—Representatives of the people of the United States—and ask that this Government be treated fairly when it comes to the question of settling its debt with these wealthy corporations. This bill does not deal fairly with us, and we ask its defeat on that ground alone. Nor does such defeat tend, either directly or indirectly, toward Government ownership of such roads.

The second weapon being used is that the Treasury of the United States will be invaded. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Hepburn] also displayed this club, and the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cannon], always careful and always keeping his weather eye on the Treasury of the United States, to guard and protect our moneys, came to his rescue, and advocates this proposition on that the rescue, for the rescue, and advocates this proposition on that the rescue, and the Green that the Green t sition on that theory; for otherwise, he contends, the Government will have to issue bonds or take from the Treasury money to protect its interests.

Let me call the attention of the committee for a few moments to Poor's Railway Manual of 1896, where, on page 894, you will find a statement that there is now in the sinking fund in the State of California $9,966,132.57, and in the sinking fund of the United States the sum of $6,259,127.15, belonging to the Central Pacific Railroad, and there is another sum further on of some $17,000,000 belonging to the United States sinking fund of the Union Pacific Railroad, not a dollar of which is in the United States Treasury, but is available to be applied in liquidation of the first-mortgage

Mr. LACEY. What is the total of the sinking fund?
Mr. HUBBARD. The total is somewhat in excess of $33,000,000, more than enough to meet all maturing first-mortgage bonds that will fall due for more than a year to come.

Mr. LACEY. What is the form of the sinking fund?

Mr. HUBBARD. Part cash and part bonds that are worth par in the market, and for which cash can be secured any moment. The gentleman from Illinois referred also to the $2,000,000 to be The gentleman from Illinois referred also to the $2,000,000 to be paid in, and he claims that the Government is that much richer for getting it. That money to-day, Mr. Chairman, is in the Treasury of the United States. Although it belongs to the railroad companies they can not get it unless Congress provides for paying it to them. It is on their earnings, and the passage of this bill will not add an additional dollar to the Treasury of the United States. The third weapon being used on members to pass the measure-I under-third weapon being used on members to pass the measure—I understand it is being urged with great energy by the lobby—is that the incoming Republican Administration does not want to be embarrassed by the settlement or readjustment of these debts. Shame on such a thought! Away with it! Is the incoming Administration afraid to meet any contingency under the sun?

Mr. Chairman, I want to say in behalf of the Republican party that I have the highest possible degree of confidence, and that unlimited, too, in the ability of that great party to successfully meet its obligations and promises as it has met all propositions in every way, manner, shape, form, and fashion heretofore. [Applause.] And there is not a line or page of her history that needs to be blotted from the record she has made. [Applause.] Within sixty days the next Administration will be in control of the Within sixty days the next Administration will be in control of the Government, and I am very certain that this Congress will be convened, and long before anything would need to come from the Treasury to liquidate the debt, or any part thereof, we will have had an opportunity to examine further into this matter and determine the first the least of the same of the mine more fully the best course to pursue. Let us have a little more information; we have not enough now to act intelligently or in the manner suggested here by the pending bill. [Applause.]
Mr. POWERS. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Grosvenor].

[Mr. GROSVENOR addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, in the thirty seconds that I have remaining I desire to say some intimation has been made on the floor that this bill was the bill of these railroad companies. Now, I desire to disabuse the minds of the members of this House of that insinuation. There is not a particle of truth in it. This or that instinuation. There is not a particle of truth in it. This committee have labored earnestly and assiduously to study this subject and to prepare the best possible bill that they could for the interest of the Government. The railroad companies have come before us through their attorneys and agents and submitted their propositions, but we have in every single case refused to accept their suggestions and have adopted the conclusions that we arrived at ourselves, after studying the ability of these roads to respect and we have given you the only bill that the companies respond, and we have given you the only bill that the companies can ever possibly comply with. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, under the order of the House the committee will rise and report the the order of the House the committee will rise and report the bill, with the amendments pending.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8189) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; also to amend an act approved July 2, 1864, and also an act approved May 7, 1878, both in amendment of said first-mentioned act and other acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, and to provide for the settlement of claims growing out of the issue of bonds to aid in the construction of certain railroads, and to secure the payment of all indebtedness to the United States of certain companies therein mentioned, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with amendments, and also with amendments pending, under the order of the House.

Mr. POWERS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman withhold that motion until the Chair can lay before the House a House bill with a Senate

Mr. POWERS. I withhold the motion for the present. The SPEAKER. The Chair will lay before the House the following House bill with a Senate amendment.

LAWS RELATING TO NAVIGATION.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2663) to amend the laws relating to navigation.

A bill (H. R. 2663) to amend the laws relating to navigation.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will have to read the bill.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. PAYNE (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, this is a long bill, and the Senate has put in one amendment in the way of a substitute. I only ask the House to nonconcur in the Senate amendment so as to get the bill in conference. I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Is there objection?

with. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I only desire to ask the gentleman if it is the intention to put the bill in conference?

Mr. PAYNE. We want to get the bill in conference.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And not to act on the Senate bill?

Mr. PAYNE. My request is simply to nonconcur in the Senate amendment and to agree to the conference requested by the Senate.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is all right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendment, and agree to the conference requested by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint the following conferees: Mr. Payne of New York, Mr. Simpkins of Massachusetts, and Mr. Berry of Kentucky.

Mr. POWERS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER. Prior to announcing the result, the Chair will submit the following personal requests of members.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows: To Mr. Tracewell, until the 14th instant, on account of important business.

To Mr. OVERSTREET, until the 14th instant, on account of important business.

To Mr. HEMENWAY, until the 14th instant, on account of important business

To Mr. Hadley, indefinitely, on account of illness.
To Mr. Sulloway, indefinitely, on account of sickness in family.
To Mr. Fowler, for six days, on account of important business.
The motion to adjourn was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday

SACRAMENTO, CAL., January 7, 1897.

Hon. George C. Perkins, United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

The following joint resolution was this day adopted by the California legislative assembly:

Joint resolution No. 6 (substitute for assembly joint resolutions Nos. 1 and 2).

Joint resolution No. 6 (substitute for assembly joint resolutions Nos. 1 and 2).

Whereas there is now pending in Congress a measure known as the Powers-Gear bill, which has for its object the refunding of the debts of certain Government-aided railroads; and

Whereas any scheme for refunding the Pacific railroads indebtedness to the United States Government, or any extension of the time for payment of the same, must result in maintaining an excessive capitalization of these roads, thus requiring high rates of fares and freights to meet the interest payments thereon, to the great burden and disadvantage of the people of the State of California: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the assembly by the State of California, the senate concurring, That we are unalterably opposed to any and all extensions of the time for payment of said debts, and also the Powers-Gear bill, or any other bill of like import; and we hereby instruct our Senators and request our Representatives in Congress to oppose by all honorable means the enactment of any such measure; and

Be it further resolved, That we favor the immediate collection on maturity of said debts, or, in the event that the same can not be collected, then we urge the enforcement of existing laws of the United States concerning this question; and

Be it further resolved, That we petition in behalf of the State of California for a hearing before the respective committees of Congress having jurisdiction of the subject; and the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States are hereby further petitioned to recommit the measure now under consideration and delay final action thereon until such hearing can be had;

Be it further resolved, That the governor be requested to immediately transmit by telegraph a copy of these resolutions to our Congressional delegation at Washington.

Assembly Chamber, Sacramento, January 7, 1897.

Assembly Chamber, Sacramento, January 7, 1897. I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of assembly joint resolu-tion No. 6, as adopted by the assembly on the 5th day of January, 1897. S. J. Duckworth, clerk.

S. J. DUCKWORTH, Chief Clerk. JAMES H. BUDD, Governor of California.

Mr. WHITE. The communication which has just been read is similar to one which was received by me, and being a memorial of the legislature of a State, I presume it will be spread upon the record.

Mr. PROCTOR. I report without amendment, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, the bill (H. R. 6713) to extend North Capitol street northward through the property of the Prospect Hill Cemetery, to pay for land to be taken for such purpose, and for other purposes. I ask that it take the place on the Calendar of the bill (S. 2332) to extend North Capitol street to the Solizionia. diers' Home, being Order of Business 830, and that the Senate bill be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the House bill will take the place indicated, and the Senate bill will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. BACON. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 214) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant permits to the executive committee on inaugural ceremonies for use of reservations or public spaces in the city of Washington on the occasion of the inauguration of the President-elect on March 4, 1897, etc., to report it favorably with amendments. The Secretary read the joint resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present con-

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know that I shall object if I can get an answer from the Senator from Georgia to my inquiry. What provision will be made respecting the cost of tearing up the streets and repairing them?

and repairing them?

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will observe the terms of the joint resolution, he will see that everything is placed under the control of the Commissioners. All of the regulations with reference to where the tracks are to be laid, in what manner they shall be laid, how the expense shall be borne of repairing the streets, are within the discretion and control of the Commissioners of the District. The railroad companies, by the joint resolution, are not authorized to do anything except by the direct permission of the Com-

Mr. ALLEN. I think as far as putting under the charge of the Commissioners the authority to determine where the tracks are to be laid is concerned, their control of that matter is all right, but to place in charge of the Commissioners the question of who shall pay for the damage done to the streets in laying the tracks and repairing the streets after they are taken up, that question ought to be determined by Congress. It the railroad companies are to get the benefit of the additional traffic and passenger carriage during the kingly ceremonies that are to take place in this city in March, then the railroad companies ought to pay for the damage done to the streets.

Mr. BACON. I quite agree with the Senator that the railroad companies should pay whatever cost may be incurred in repairing the streets, and I have not the slightest doubt but that will be required of them. In fact, that was a matter so patent and so obvious that I presume it never occurred to the committee that it would be necessary to express it in the joint resolution.

Mr. ALLEN, Mr. President—

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, I will state that the Commissioners have no authority under the joint resolution to impose any of this expense either upon the Government or upon the treasury of the District. It is not to be presumed that such will be done. Every influence, of course, will be on the other side, so far as those considerations which control this question are concerned. I presume there will be no objection, while we think it unnecessary, for the Senator to offer an amendment to that effect, because that is the intention of the joint resolution.

I will state further, while I am on the floor, that it is the sole purpose of this measure to enable the railroad companies to do what they have done heretofore, I am informed, at every inauguration, which is to lay additional tracks along their present lines simply for the accommodation of the increased number of cars which a large crowd will necessarily require.

Mr. ALLEN. To that I enter no objection. I am perfectly willing that the company shall have the right to lay additional tracks, under the supervision of the Commissioners of the District; but I do not want, after a time, some Senator to come in here and offer an amendment to an appropriation bill to cover the expenses of repairing the streets and charge that expense to the Government.

Mr. BACON. I will ask the Senator if, in the past, any such claim has ever been made for similar service?

Mr. ALLEN. I can not say that there has ever been any such claim made, but I know that it has been the policy heretofore to saddle every conceivable expense upon the Government in connection with the improvement of streets, the laying of railroad tracks, and, in fact, everything that is done in this District.

Mr. FAULKNER. Will the Senator from Nebraska permit me a moment?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.
Mr. FAULKNER. I had charge of this matter four years ago, and I will state to the Senator that it is the same joint resolution and I will state to the Senator that it is the same joint resolution which has been uniformly passed since I have been in the Senate. This measure will not apply to nor will permission be granted to lay tracks upon any asphalt streets at all, but they are the same streets on which the present tracks are running. The railroad companies have always been required by the Commissioners, under a similar joint resolution, to enter into an agreement with them to pay all the expenses of putting down the tracks and in putting the streets back in the same condition in which they were found at the time the additional expense was in which they were found at the time the additional expense was incurred. That has always been provided by an agreement between the railroad companies and the Commissioners.

Mr. ALLEN. With the understanding that the Commissioners will do so in this case, I shall not object to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present con sideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed. BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 3497) to define the duties of the secretary of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

THE TENNESSEE CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. BATE. I introduce a joint resolution and ask for its present consideration. It is rather a matter of urgency.

The joint resolution (S. R. 189) providing for the erection of a Government building at the Tennessee Centennial Exposition was ing for the Government exhibit at the Tennessee Centennial Exposition authorized by the act of Congress approved December 22, 1896, without public advertisement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amend-ment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRESENTATION OF MORNING BUSINESS.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following amendment to the standing rules of the Senate; which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

AMENDMENT TO RULE VII.

In section 1, after the words "following order," strike out as follows: "The presentation of petitions and memorials" and "the introduction of bills and joint resolutions."

Strike out sections 3 and 4 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"3. Members having petitions or memorials or bills of a private nature to present may deliver them to the Secretary, indorsing their names and the reference or disposition to be made thereof; and said petitions and memorials or bills of a private nature, except such as, in the judgment of the Vice-President, are of an obscene or insulting character, shall be entered on the Journal with the names of the members presenting them, and the Secretary shall furnish a transcript of such entry to the Official Reporters of Debates for publication in the Record.

"4. Any petition or memorial or private bill excluded under this rule shall be returned to the member from whom it was received, and petitions and private bills which have been inappropriately referred may, by the direction of the committee having possession of the same, be properly referred in the manner originally presented, and an erroneous reference of a petition or private bill under this clause shall not confer jurisdiction upon the committee to consider or report the same.

"5. All other bills, memorials, and resolutions may in like manner be delivered, indorsed with the names of members introducing them, to the Vice-President, to be by him referred, and the titles and references thereof and of all bills, resolutions, and documents referred under the rules, shall be entered on the Journal and printed in the Record of the next day, and correction in case of error of reference may be made by the Senate on any day, immediately after the reading of the Journal, by unanimous consent, or on motion of a committee claiming jurisdiction, or on the report of the committee to which the bill has been erroneously referred.

"6. When a bill, resolution, or memorial is introduced 'by request,' these words shall be entered upon the

First, whether Isaac Waiker & Sons, of Philadelphia, Pa., who are engaged in constructing additions to and making repairs on the naval hospital at Brooklyn, in the State of New York, have violated, or are violating, or suffering violations of the act of Congress of August 1, 1892, commonly known as the "eight-hour labor law," by requiring those engaged in laboring for them on said work to work more than eight hours per day; and if so, what steps, if any, have been taken by the Navy Department to prevent such violations; and if like violations are being committed by P. J. Carlan, a contractor, of Brooklyn, N. Y., and what steps, if any, are being taken to prevent the same; and

The joint resolution (S. R. 189) providing for the erection of a Government building at the Tennessee Centennial Exposition was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to solicit proposals and to contract for the erection of the build-

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present con--sideration of the resolution?

Mr. CHANDLER. I think the resolution had better go over until to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. An objection being interposed, the resolution will go over under the rule.

Mr. ALLEN. Can I have the attention of the Senator just a

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.
Mr. ALLEN. This resolution only covers one suggestion. It is alleged, and I presume there is no doubt about the truthfulness of the statement, that Isaac Walker & Sons, who are engaged in repairing the hospital and making additions to the hospital at Brooklyn, N. Y., are violating the eight-hour law in requiring their laborers to work nine hours, and that by such means they are interfering with the established price of eight hours' labor in that market

The resolution simply calls for such information as the Secretary of the Navy may possess respecting this matter, and if he has no power to prevent a violation of the law it asks for his opinion as to the measures necessary to prevent a repetition of such a violation of it. I hope the Senator will withdraw his objection.

Mr. CHANDLER. If it is a mere call for information I shall not object, but I ask to have the resolution read again.

Mr. ALLEN. It is a mere call for information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be again read.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. CHANDLER. In the first place, the words "and required" should be stricken out. The language is "directed and required." should be stricken out.
One direction is enough.
Mr. COCKRELL. That is enough.
Mr. CHANDLER. The words "and required" should be stricken out.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well; let those words go out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so modified.

Mr. CHANDLER. Now, I ask the Senator whether he understands that these employments are in violation of an existing law of Congres

Mr. ALLEN. I do so understand, Mr. President. If the Senator will indulge me just a moment, I will state that I understand the established custom in Brooklyn and in that part of the country has approved the eight-hour system, and that all day labor is based upon eight hours of labor by the employee. I think there is no doubt about the fact that Isaac Walker & Sons, and possibly Carlan, have ignored the law, and required their men to work nine hours for the same wages that other men receive who perform like services for private parties, and who are accredited with eight hours of labor. Now, if that is being done, and there is information in the Navy Department of that fact, it occurs to me the Senate ought to know it and the country ought to know it, and if the Secretary of the Navy has no power to put a bit upon Isaac Walker & Sons of the Navy has no power to put a bit upon Isaac Walker & Sons and other contractors who are doing Government work, then it is high time for Congress to know that fact and to know what further legislation may be necessary to authorize restraint upon contractors on Government works.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I may be very dull and not well informed, but I did not know that contractors for Government works.

ment work could not employ men more than eight hours a day. The law prohibits employing men for more than eight hours a day in the navy-yards and other Government establishments, and that law I had the honor to strictly enforce when I was in the Navy Department. There had been an adjustment of the hours of labor that was not in exact accordance with that law. The error was corrected. The law is in force in the navy-yards and in the arsenals of the country, but I did not know that contractors with the Government were limited as to the hours of labor in which their men should be employed.

The objection to the Senator's resolution is that it assumes all the way through that we have a law upon the statute book limiting Government contractors in their hours of labor for their men. I am informed by Senators around me that they are ignorant of any such law, and I think the Senator must be mistaken about it.

Mr. ALLEN. I have no doubt the Senator from New Hampshire was a most excellent Secretary of the Navy and carried out shire was a most excellent Secretary of the Navy and carried out the provisions of all laws.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not doubt that myself [laughter], but what I do doubt is whether there is any law which prohibits contractors employing men for more than eight hours a day.

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire is throwing a spear at a gnat. That is not the question at all.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator should not regard himself as a gnat. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLEN. No.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have always disclaimed any idea of ever belittling the proportions of the Senator from Nebraska. [Laughter.]

belittling the proportions of the Senator from Nebraska. [Laugh-

Mr. ALLEN. I agree with the Senator from New Hampshire that he was a great Secretary of the Navy, and that I am physically a fair-sized statesman—I think we will agree upon that—but what I mean by saying the Senator is throwing a spear at a gnat is this: Congress passed an eight-hour law that controls all work ander the supervision of the Government in all Departments. The Senator from New Hampshire and the Senators who are sitting around him are all good lawyers, and I believe intend to carry out the provisions of every law that is made and to enact such other laws as may be necessary to bring about the ends of justice. Now, here are men who are occupying a quasi-official position in this country. The law of respondent superior applies to the relation existing between these contractors and this Government. There can not be any doubt about that. The Secretary of the Treasury or the Secretary of the Navy has power, when he makes a contract with contractors to do work upon public buildings or a contract with contractors to do work upon public buildings or in the construction of naval vessels, to prescribe the hours that shall constitute a day for the performance of that work. I am satisfied my friend from New Hampshire, if he were in the Navy Department again, as he probably will be under the incoming Administration [laughter], would enforce a law of that kind. I feel confident that he would do that.

Mr. President if it shauld so haven that the Secretary of the dent that he would do that.

Mr. President, if it should so happen that the Secretary of the Navy technically does not possess this power, I appeal to my friend from New Hampshire, as the friend of down-trodden labor and of men who are compelled to earn their living by their daily toil, that it is eminently proper that the Secretary of the Navy should inform us upon this subject, and that we should enact such further legislation as many heavestrial to restort this place of well.

is upon this subject, and that we should enact such further legislation as may be essential to protect this class of people. That is all that the resolution calls for.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the resolution is objectionable in that it assumes that there is a law prohibiting contractors with the Government from employing their men more than eight hours a day. There is no such law, and the Secretary of the Navy has no right whatever to interfere with the heart of the Court of t hours a day. There is no such law, and the Secretary of the Navy has no right whatever to interfere with the hours of labor of Gov-ernment contractors. He has control over the laborers employed ernment contractors. He has control over the laborers employed directly by the Government, and no others.

I think that the resolution is also objectionable at this time because it conveys an impression that there is a violation of law when there is no violation of law, as the Senator and every other Senator well knows. If the Senator will allow the resolution to go over, and it is in such a form that it does not create a false implication, then I shall have no objection to its passage.

Mr. ALLEN, I want to submit to my friend just this one property.

Mr. ALLEN. I want to submit to my friend just this one proposition, and then he can make his objection if he will. I want to ask the Senator if he takes the position that the Secretary of the Navy has not the power to insert in the contract with Isaac Walker & Sons a provision that they shall observe the eight-hour law and to cancel their contract if they violate it?

Mr. CHANDLER. He may do it if he pleases, but he is not under the slightest obligation to do it. The Senator knows that the new Navy of the United States has been built mainly by contracts with outside parties, and the Secretary of the Navarrance. tracts with outside parties; and the Secretary of the Navy never has undertaken to prescribe the hours of the day during which the workmen upon those ships should labor. It would have made an enormous difference in the contract price of the vessels if he had. The Government has strictly limited itself so far to prescribing the hours of labor for its own employees, and the Senascribing the hours of labor for its own employees, and the Senator's implication ought not to go in a resolution. The Senator, the more he talks, convinces me the more that the resolution ought to be carefully examined before it is adopted.

Mr. ALLEN. If I had known that, I might have started out with the Senator's views, and possibly I could have reconciled them with my present views, but I submit, if the Senator insists upon his objection, that while our Navy has been gotten up largely in the manner suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire, it has been at the expense of the life and the health and the rights of the men who did the work; and if this great Government has not the power to protect these people, and its Secretary of the Navy has not the manhood to protect them when he canbecause he has ample power to insert a provision in the contract for their protection—it is pretty near time the people of the United States should know that fact.

Mr. MILLS. Is this discussion by unanimous consent, Mr.

Mr. MILLS. Is this discussion by unanimous consent, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The discussion is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. MILLS. Then I object.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Texas allow me one word more?

Mr. MILLS. Very well.
Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Nebraska believes in an eight-hour day for all workmen, and possibly that proposition has some merit.

Mr. ALLEN. I work sixteen hours a day myself.
Mr. CHANDLER. But the law has not yet been put upon the statute books that would authorize the Secretary of the Navy to do this thing

Mr. ALLEN

Mr. ALLEN. I disagree with the Senator. Mr. CHANDLER. Therefore the Senator ought not to make an implication in the resolution that there is such a law, when everyone knows there is no such law.

Mr. ALLEN. I think there is,

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being interposed, the resolution will go over.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Territories:

A bill (H. R. 7087) to amend section 8 of the act entitled "An act providing a civil government for Alaska," approved May 17,

A bill (H. R. 7088) to create the office of surveyor-general in Alaska.

CHICAGO RAILWAY STRIKE OF 1894.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Attorney-General be, and is hereby, authorized and instructed to print as an appendix to his last annual reportfull copies of all telegraphic and other correspondence between the Department of Justice and public officers, private persons, railroad companies, and their officers and agents, in the year 1894, relative to the disorders in the city of Chicago, Ill., during said year, and to the action taken by the Government of the United States in suppressing the same.

Mr. HOAR. I ask that House bill 8110, being the bankruptcy bill, be made the special order for January 25, a fortnight from bill, be made the special order for January 25, a fortnight from to-day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the title of the bill be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 8110) to establish a uniform law on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States.

Mr. HOAR. What I desire is to have that bill made a special order not to come up before the 25th of January. That is by agreement with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. Teller], who is absent at this moment, and also to accommodate the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. George] who is absent. The Senate will then have the matter completely in its power.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if the proposed arrangement is satisfactory to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HOAR. I have no doubt it is, as it is satisfactory to the Senator from Colorado, who agrees with the Senator from Mississippi.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

TERMS OF PRESIDENT AND REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. PROCTOR. I ask that Orders of Business 62 and 63 on the table Calendar be taken from the table, read by the Secretary, and laid before the Senate for a very brief consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be read by title. The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S.R. 180) providing that the Constitution of the United States be so amended that the President shall hold his office for one term of six years, and shall not be eligible for reelection, and a joint resolution (S.R. 181) pro-yiding that the Constitution of the United States be so amended that the members of the House of Representatives shall be chosen that the members of the House of Representatives shall be chosen every third year.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I believe in the wisdom of the changes proposed because:

First. A longer Presidential term and ineligibility for reelection are more in accord with the ideas and purposes of the framers of the Constitution than is the present system as it has developed in practical results.

Second. The proposed change is not radical or revolutionary, but is in the line of true conservatism. It is a change of the letter to preserve the spirit of the Constitution.

Third. Reeligibility is wrong in theory and vicious in practice, for it results in the use of the patronage of his office by the President for the promotion of his chances of reelection, or else subjects him to the impatrition of such page 2.

him to the imputation of such use.

Fourth. The change will more thoroughly divorce the legislative and executive branches of the Government, an end most strongly desired by the Constitutional Convention.

Fifth. Even if the present system was wise in the beginning, the changed conditions, the growth of the country in population, especially in cities, the great increase in our territory, and the growing danger of sudden popular revulsions make the change now desirable saved from such frequent disturbances, and the time and expense saved from such frequent disturbances, and the time and expense incident to campaigns will be proportionately reduced.

Seventh. By lengthening the terms of Representatives to three years, laws will be better considered and will have a longer and fairer trial before their friends go out of power in Congress.

The American people rightly regard the Constitution with great reverence. It has proven itself wonderfully adapted to conserve to them equally the blessings of liberty and the protection of law. Our own judgment of its merits is perhaps influenced by our affection; but the verdict of affection is also the verdict of disinterested criticism. Mr. Bryce, whose commentaries upon our institutions are probably the most thoughtful foreign criticism since that of De Tocqueville, says:

It ranks above every other written constitution for the intrinsic excellence of its scheme, its adaptation to the circumstances of the people, the simplicity, brevity, and precision of its language, its judicious mixture of definiteness of principle with elasticity in detail.

We are naturally conservative with respect to any proposal to change it in any way. Surely such a proposal is not to be made lightly nor without good reason.

The amendment proposed by the resolution is one of detail. Its purpose is not to change but really to strengthen the most fundamental principle of the Constitution—the separation of the execnertal principle of the Constitution—the separation of the executive and legislative powers. Nor is the proposal a new one. A longer Presidential term, without reeligibility, was the original decision of the Constitutional Convention. It was not changed without much wavering and many misgivings. A prominent member who declared near the close of the discussion that he had never made up an opinion on the question entirely to his own satisfac-tion, apparently spoke the sense of the whole. Since then it has the third is the constitution and common law, from their own colonial and State constitutions, from former experiments in republican government, and from the writings of political philosophers they took their precedents.

The Constitution-

Says a distinguished writer-is no exception to the rule that everything which has power to win the obe-dience and respect of men must have its roots deep in the past.

But when they came to the discussion of a National Executive, precedents failed them. It was practically a field of original investigation. They wisely discarded, with practical unanimity, the idea of a plural Executive; but how to elect the Executive, the length of his term, and whether he should be eligible to a second term occasioned much discussion in the convention, and certainly more vacillation than any other problem before it.

On the 1st day of June

Says Mr. Bancroft in his History of the Constitution-

Says Mr. Bancrort in his History of the Constitution—the convention took into consideration the National Executive. The same spirit of conciliation prevailed, but with a chaos of ideas and a shyness in the members to declare their minds. Should the National Executive be one or many? a question, from a difference among themselves, the plan of the Virginia delegates had left undecided. Should it be chosen directly by the people, or by electors, or by the State legislatures, or by the executives of the States, or by one branch of the National Legislature, or by both branches?
And if by both, by joint or concurrent ballot or by lot? How long should be its term of service? and how far should its reeligibility be limited? * * *
Here the convention marched and countermarched for want of guides.

The old saying that intuitions are more reliable then effer.

The old saying that intuitions are more reliable than after-ing the word "seven," by a vote of five and a half to four and a half States, and the following day the ineligibility of the President for a second election was affirmed by a vote of eight and a half to one and a half States. In that shape it was reported June 19 from the committee of the whole. July 17 the convention voted to strike out the words "to be ineligible a second time," by a vote to strike out the words "to be ineligible a second time," by a vote of six States to four; but the same day they unanimously voted to reconsider their action. Two days later the convention voted to make the term six years, without the ineligibility clause. But on the 26th of the same month, by a vote of seven to three, they reverted to the original proposition of a seven-year term, the President to be ineligible a second time, and in that form it appeared in the proposition of the Continuing reserved to t dent to be ineligible a second time, and in that form it appeared in the original draft of the Constitution reported to the convention August 6 by the committee on detail. August 31 the convention referred such parts of the Constitution as had been postponed and such parts of reports as had not been acted upon to a committee of one from each State, and on September 4, or only thirteen days before the convention finally adjourned, that committee reported the provision in question of the Constitution substantially as finally adopted.

Since then the proposal has often been made, and from the second term. Jefferson was in favor of it. President Jackson urged Congress in several of his messages to propose to the States an amendment to the Constitution rendering the Executive ineligible after one term of service, and such a resolution was introduced in 1830.

Mr. President, I have noticed on a very recent anniversary occasion that associations of widely different political views have in their separate meetings paid their tributes of respect and affection to President Jackson. From another political standpoint I wish to indorse the views he gave on this subject.

In his annual message that year, after stating that he had before recommended that the President be made ineligible for reelection,

President Jackson said:

President Jackson said:

I renew the recommendation with an increased confidence that its adoption will strengthen those checks by which the Constitution designed to secure the independence of each department of Government and promote the healthful and equitable administration of all the trusts which it has created. The agent most likely to contravene this design of the Constitution is the Chief Magistrate. In order, particularly, that this appointment may, as far as possible, be placed beyond the reach of any improper influences; in order that he may approach the solemn responsibilities of the highest office in the gift of a free people uncommitted to any other course than the strict line of constitutional duty, and that the securities for this independence may be rendered as strong as the nature of power and the weakness of its possessor will admit, I can not too carnestly invite your attention to the propriety of promoting such amendment of the Constitution as will render him ineligible after one term of service.

In due time the Whigs took up the one-term principle, and they put it in their platform in 1844. Henry Clay advocated it with his accustomed vigor. The Southern Confederacy embodied it in its constitution. In 1866 and 1871 it was urged by Wade and Summer, who introduced resolutions in its behalf. Writing in 1871, Horace Greeley said:

All that is needed is an intelligent, earnest, widespread conviction that the practice of reelecting a Chief Magistrate while in office is fraught with evil and peril—that it distracts his attention from the proper cares and duties of his station, and compels him to consider not who are fittest and most worthy to fill the offices in his gift, but what choice will be most likely to improve his chances of renomination.

And again:

Office seeking is our national vice, divesting our workshops of apprentices and our farms of half the intelligent, energetic, aspiring youth who ought to make our agriculture of the next thirty years exhibit a series of brilliant advances and improvements upon all that preceded it. But vainly shall we hope for such reform through the lopping off of branches while the root of the upas remains intact and vital. That root is the reelection while in office of Presidents, governors, and other dispensers of vast patronage, with their consequent temptation to use that patronage in aid of their own continuance in power.

In 1876 Mr. Tilden, in his letter accepting the nomination for the Presidency, expressed himself as follows:

It might encourage delusive expectations if I withheld here the expression of my convictions that no reform of the civil service in this country will be complete and permanent until its Chief Magistrate is constitutionally disqualified for reelection, experience having frequently exposed the futility of self-imposed restriction by candidate or incumbent. Through this solemnity only can he be effectively delivered from his greatest temptation to misuse the power and patronage with which the Executive is charged.

August 18, 1884, President Cleveland wrote in his letter of acceptance:

When an election to office shall be the selection by the voters of one of their number to assume for a time a public trust instead of his dedication to the profession of politics; when the holders of the ballot, quickened by a sense of duty, shall avenge truth betrayed and pledges broken, and when the suffrage shall be altogether free and uncorrupted, the full realization of a government by the people will be at hand. And of the means to this end not one would, in my judgment, be more effective than an amendment to the Constitution disqualifying the President from reelection.

When we consider the patronage of this great office, the allurements of power, the temptation to retain public places once gained, and, more than all, the availability a party finds in an incumbent when a horde of office-holders, with a zeal born of benefit received and fostered by the hope of favors yet to come, stand ready to aid with money and trained political service, we recognize in the eligibility of the President for reelection a most serious danger to that calm, deliberate, and intelligent political action which must characterize a government by the people.

From the very foundation of the Government many of our

From the very foundation of the Government many of our ablest and most thoughtful public men have favored an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the reelection of a President.

In the Constitutional Convention the decision of the question actually turned upon the settlement of that other vexed question of how to elect the Executive. Choice by the National Legislature was proposed by the Virginia plan, and it seems to have been at the proposed by the Virginia plan, and it seems to have been at the proposed by the Virginia plan. in the beginning by far the most popular plan. The first vote for a seven-year term and ineligibility for a second term was taken when the greater part of the members regarded this as the most probable manner of election, and it was proposed by removing the possibility of a second term to make the Executive less dependthe possibility of a second term to make the Executive less dependent on the Legislature. As the plan to elect otherwise than by the National Legislature gained favor, it was urged that rotation in office was not necessary if the choice of the Executive was not to be lodged in the Legislature. All the various plans crystallized into two, election by the National Legislature with a long term and ineligibility, and choice by popular elections through the electoral college with a short term and reeligibility.

The chief arguments put forward in opposition to ineligibility were two. Roger Sherman urged that it kept out of the office men were two. Roger Sherman urged that it kept out of the once men who were best qualified to execute its duties; but the experience of the last half century has proven that the influence of an able and faithful administration is not a match for the personal disappointments of the army of favor seekers whom the President must turn away unsatisfied. Gouveneur Morris and Hamilton urged that it tended to destroy the motive to good behavior. In practice, reeligibility has proved to be a temptation in the opposite direction, to use the power and patronage of the office to promote reelection. The relation of patronage to the National Executive seems to have been little regarded. Indeed, the prospective patronage was not then large.

It was also suggested that as a strong and popular Executive came to the close of his term and could not be reelected, there might be great danger that the people would be tempted beyond control to set aside the Constitution for their temporary gratification. Such fears were perhaps not groundless when the Constitution was but an experiment. But the stability of our institution has been said to the constitution has been said to the constitution was but an experiment. tutions has long since banished such fears, and no man can rival tutions has long since banished such fears, and no man can rival the Constitution in the affection of the people.

The resolution proposes a modification of the Constitution, but it is a modification of a detail in order to strengthen its most fundamental principle. The very basis of the Constitution is the complete separation of the legislative and executive powers. So long as the Constitutional Convention contemplated the election of the Executive by Congress, it favored ineligibility for a second term, in order that the ambition of a President to succeed himself might not make him dependent upon Congress.

By the scheme of the electoral college-

Says Mr. Bancroft-

the convention hoped to escape from the danger of a corrupt traffic between the National Legislature and candidates for the Executive.

And again:

From confidence in the purity of the electoral body thus established the reeligibility of the Executive was again affirmed.

They foresaw the difficulty, but they were in error in thinking they had corrected it. There is no other part of the Constitution which in practice has worked so differently from what was expected as the machinery of Presidential elections. It was contemplated that the people would simply delegate their elective powers to Presidential electors and to Presidential electors, and

No Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States—

Says the Constitution-shall be appointed an elector.

Members of Congress and Federal officeholders were to be excluded from the electoral college. Thus they expected that the President would neither be dependent upon Congress nor upon his own appointees for a reelection.

How different is it all in practice! The position of Presidential elector, though still regarded as one of dignity, is purely clerical. In honor he is excluded from the exercise of any choice. National elections are simply contests of the candidates of the political parties before the people. A President ambitious to succeed himself must secure the nomination from his party, and the most potent elements in national conventions are the very persons whom the Constitution intended to exclude from taking any part in the election of the President. Senators and Representatives in Con-gress and Federal officeholders may not constitute the majority gress and Federal officeholders may not constitute the majority of representation by actual count in national conventions, but their influence is the most potent in their constitution. The very dependence, therefore, upon Congress and upon Federal officeholders for election to a second term which the Constitution intended to prevent in fact exists. It can not be doubted for one moment that if the framers of the Constitution could have foreseen how little they were correcting the dangers they so evidently feared, they would never have abandoned their original intention of requiring rotation in the Presidential office. of requiring rotation in the Presidential office.

I will ask the Secretary to read what De Tocqueville said in

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested. The Secretary read as follows:

The Secretary read as follows:

When a simple candidate seeks to rise by intrigue, his maneuvers must necessarily be limited to a narrow sphere; but when the Chief Magistrate enters the lists he borrows the strength of the Government for his own purposes.

* * * The private citizen who employs the most immoral practices to acquire power can only act in a manner indirectly prejudicial to the public prosperity. But if the representative of the Executive descends into the lists, the cares of Government dwindle into second-rate importance, and the success of his election is his first concern. All laws and negotiations are then to him nothing more than electioneering schemes; places become the reward of services rendered, not to the nation, but to its Chief; and the influence of the Government, if not injurious to the country, is at least no longer beneficial to the community for which it was created.

It is impossible to consider the ordinary course of affairs in the United States without perceiving that the desire of being reelected is the chief sim of the President; that his whole Administration, and even his most indifferent measures, tend to this object; and that, as the crisis approaches, his personal interest takes the place of his interest in the public good. The principle of reeligibility renders the corrupt influence of elective governments still more extensive and pernicious. It tends to degrade the political morality of the people, and to substitute adroitness for patriotism.

Mr. PROCTOR. This De Tocqueville wrote in dispassionate and friendly criticism in 1835, when the patronage was relatively small. In the light of our subsequent experience and present conditions, can we say that he put the matter too strongly?

If a President aspires to a second term—and the best Presidents.

usually have so aspired-his acts and his appointments, if not his policy, are necessarily influenced and colored by that fact. if perchance he does not aspire to reelection, he is still hampered by the fact of the constitutional possibility of such reelection. His most unselfish and patriotic acts will be charged by some to that ambition, whether he entertains it or not. It promotes captious criticism. It induces distrust of the President's disinterestedness and patriotism, and it belittles and detracts from the dignity of the office itself. And not only does it weaken the President and his Administration at home, but the possibility of reeligibility actually weakens the effectiveness of our foreign policy. In the beginning of our present Venezuelan crisis the most common comment abroad upon the patriotic position taken by the President was that it was an electioneering dodge. Thus does the world discount an official expression of the patriotic sentiment of our people, because, in view of the possibility of the reelection of the President, the outside world also has become accustomed to look to that fact for the deepest motives of a President's actions.

We sometimes speak of the practical limit established by precedent against a third term. The wise and patriotic declension of Washington to serve a third time was based upon the very idea that there ought to be a limit to eligibility. But the limit thus imperfectly established does not meet the case, because actual prohibition of a third election does not relieve the first term from the evils of reeligibility, and because such a limit is so imperfectly established that in fact it scarcely relieves it of evil during the second. Reeligibility is wrong in theory, vicious in practice, and there should be a definite prohibition against it.

The greatest objection of which I am aware to this proposed.

The greatest objection of which I am aware to this proposed change is that it might deprive us, in time of some great national exigency, of the services of a leader who seems to be peculiarly equipped to be at the head of the Government. Such a thing is possible, yet I can hardly conceive of an emergency in which one man, and one man only, shall be fit to be at the head of the Government; and it is hard to believe that an emergency will arise that will last for more than six years, the term for which a President will be chosen under the proposed amendment. It is impossible to perfect any detail of a constitutional system so that it may not work unfavorably in some emergency. Constitutional systems, however, though intended to cover all exigencies so far as possible, are designed more to meet the everyday life and existence of the Government than some exceptional complication that may never occur. The question is, how to safeguard the public interests in the most cases and in the largest degree; how to obtain the most disinterested administration of the Government from day to day of our national existence. If a single term with prohibition of a second will do that, then we need not fear the other. In this very connection De Tocqueville says that "to reserve an expedient for extraordinary perils the country has been expected." dient for extraordinary perils, the country has been exposed to daily dangers.

To the objection that reeligibility is an incentive to good administration and therefore should not be removed, we answer that such an argument is as strong for reeligibility to a third term, and as strong for reeligibility to a fourth. There must be some final administration in which such incentive loses its force, and it may as well be the first.

The principle of ineligibility for a second term has always been coupled with the proposal to lengthen the term. Though less important, it is perhaps not an unnatural correlative of the other. In the convention the question was between a longer term without reeligibility and a shorter one with it. The latter was regarded as the equivalent of the former, as it was expected that a President, if worthy, would ordinarily be reelected. And such was generally the rule during the first half century. Now it is the exception. Frequent Presidential elections disturb the business interests of the country, which in their present complicated conditions have become very sensitive to changes. At the foundation of the Government these interests were comparatively simple. Labor was largely its own employer, and its relations were not easily disturbed. Producer and consumer were more often than now combined in one. Telegraphs and railroads were unknown. The developing resources of the country had not yet brought with them the increased complexity of business relations between the different sections, and especially between this country and foreign lands—relations that now exist and are so quickly affected by the shifting fortunes of politics. Competition had not become the fierce war of recent years. Not so nicely adjusted, business relations were not so easily disturbed. The influence of a Presidential election upon the business interests of the country a Presidential election upon the business interests of the country was not contemplated by the framers of the Constitution. They thought of the Executive and his election only in relation to the Government they were forming. They contemplated the Executive as a factor in that Government. They did not consider the effect upon the governed of the process of electing him. To-day, in a manner unforeseen by them, the Presidential elections raise the utmost havoc with all business interests. The unrest and lack of confidence in business circles truthfully reflect the uncertainty of the result of each election. In a recent paper, I find the following language attributed to Dr. Depew: lowing language attributed to Dr. Depew:

Every four years business is virtually paralyzed for fully six months, partly on account of the utter absorption of the people in the canvass and partly because such issues are raised in the campaign that business conditions are bound to be affected by the result. We have hardly recovered from the effects of one Presidential campaign before we are plunged into the midst of another. With a six-year term and a constitutional prohibition of reelection, we would have a President free during his term of office from any temptation to use his power in any way to secure a renomination or reelection, and free also from the suspicion of such an attempt, which is almost as bad.

Furthermore, the time taken up by a campaign and the expense Furthermore, the time taken up by a campaign and the expense incident thereto are matters of no small moment aside from the disastrous effects upon business interests. I realize that campaign funds are enveloped in a haze of obscurity, and that in speaking of them I am treading upon delicate ground; but it is safe to say that the expense of a campaign has increased many fold in the last twenty years. Grant's first campaign fund is said to have been $150,000, but now it would require more figures to express the amount devoted to campaign purposes.

to have been $150,000, but now it would require more figures to express the amount devoted to campaign purposes.

It has been suggested that the change might lengthen the term of a bad President, but there is not so much strength in the objection as there might seem. We have not often, if ever, had bad Presidents, and there would be much less danger of getting one with a six-year term than there is now with the four-year term, for there would be a longer time for the policy of the preceding Administration to have a fair trial and be approved or condemned. Administration to have a fair trial and be approved or condemned Administration to have a fair trial and be approved or condemned by the deliberate judgment of the people, and there would be much less danger of hasty political revulsions. If we were so unfortunate as to have an undesirable President who did not command the confidence and respect of the people, his power would soon be checked by the Congressional and Senatorial elec-tions; and if we were so unfortunate as to have a corrupt President, a calamity which has never yet occurred, he would always be subject to impeachment.

It seems to have been the experience of a good number of the States that long terms for their executive officers are desirable, Eleven of the States—California, Connecticut, Delaware, Indiana, Maryland, Mississippi, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Vermont, Virginia, and West Virginia—have lengthened the terms of their governors from what they originally were, while of the eight States which formerly had gubernatorial terms of one year Massachusetts which formerly had gubernatorial terms of one year massachusetts and Rhode Island only hold to the practice.

Even if wise in the beginning, the changed conditions, our growth in population, especially in the cities, the great increase in our territory, and the growing danger of sudden popular reaction make the change advisable as a matter of safety. It is not a radical or revolutionary change, but one in the line of true conservatism. It is a change in the letter of the Constitution to preserve its spirit. It is more in accord with the ideas and purposes of the framers of the Constitution than are the practical results that have developed from the present system.

In what I have said of the dangers of the present situation, I speak with great deference of the great men who have filled the high office of President and who have been candidates for reelection. I doubt not but that they have been as little influenced and controlled by the selfish considerations mentioned as one placed in so inconsistent a position could be. The difficulty, however, controlled by the seinsh considerations mentioned as one piaced in so inconsistent a position could be. The difficulty, however, is that the position is inherently an inconsistent and antagonistic one. One person can not in the nature of things be at the same time a perfect President and a Presidential candidate. I believe that the people are becoming more and more dissatisfied with having the high office of President used, or having it possi-They are becomble to use it, to prolong the incumbent's tenure. ing more and more dissatisfied with seeing Presidential campaigns run from the White House. It will be tried just as long as it is possible. It will only cease when the Congress and the States by constitutional amendment return to the spirit of the Constitution and the original plan of the framers. Then no personal ambition of a Chief Magistrate can ever compete with his ambition to serve his country well and leave an honorable record for his Administration.

The extension of the terms of Representatives in Congress should go with the extension of the Presidential term. The practical benefits sure to result from this change and the advantages of it to legislation are self-evident. Now the Representatives have hardly concluded their first session before they come up for reelec-This long session must necessarily become longer with the h of the country. The legislation of the long session has growth of the country. The legislation of the long session has had no trial, and often, I may say usually, in the case of important new legislation on lines of party policy, there is a popular reaction before it can have a fair trial. Then comes the short session, in which little is done except to pass appropriation bills. With a three years' term, instead of the present single inordinately long session, there would be two sessions unlimited by the end of a Congress, and of more moderate duration, which would end of a Congress, and of more moderate duration, which would practically nearly double the time for deliberation and considerate legislation. The laws of the first session would have been in operation for a year or more, which would give time for a fairer trial and consideration by the people, with much less danger of too hasty legislation and too hasty condemnation of laws when once made—a danger to which the country is more and more subjected as it grows older.

I believe that the amendments suggested, if adopted, will lead to more stable administration and to better legislation and to better and more conservative consideration of public questions by the people.

Mr. MILLS. The Senator from Nevada has the floor.
Mr. STEWART. I will take but a moment. The recommendation that the President shall not be eligible for reelection I fully approve. There is no doubt that it would be a great gain. I concur with the recommendation of General Jackson in that respect. But to lengthening the term I see grave objections. There would be too much at stake. The country would be too much disturbed to have an election pending which would put the Chief Executive in office for the term of six years. That would be reform in the wrong direction. The Senator from Vermont suggests that it is wrong direction. The Senator from Vermont suggests that it is wrong direction. The Senator from Vermont suggests that it is very expensive to elect—

Mr. MILLS. I hope the Senator from Nevada will not take me off the floor. I gave notice that I would address the Senate this morning, and if he wishes to discuss this question, he can do so at some other time. I think I am entitled by the courtesies of the Senate and under the rule to proceed with my argument.

Mr. STEWART. I did not know that the Senator from Texas was entitled to the floor. Let the joint resolutions lie on the table, and I will complete my remarks to-morrow morning.

and I will complete my remarks to-morrow morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 8th instant approved and signed the following act and joint resolution:

An act (S. 2047) extending the time within which the University of Utah shall occupy lands heretofore granted to it; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 162) continuing in force section 2 of the act approved June 3, 1896, entitled "An act to repeal section 61 of an act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," which became a law August

The message also announced that the President of the United States had on the 9th instant approved and signed the following

An act (S. 337) to refer the claim of the owners of the brig Tally-Ho to the Court of Claims; and

An act (S. 1265) for the relief of Emmart, Dunbar & Co.

INDEPENDENCE OF CUBA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], which will be read.

The joint resolution (S. R. 188) in reference to the recognition of the independence of foreign governments was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the expediency of recognizing the independence of a foreign government belongs to Congress, and when Congress shall so determine, the Executive should act in harmony with the legislative department of the Government.

SEC. 2. That the independence of the Republic of Cuba ought to be, and hereby is, recognized, and the sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated for salary and expenses of a minister to that Government whenever such minister shall be appointed by the President.

Mr. MILLS. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that when 2 o'clock arrives I may be permitted to continue my remarks until I have closed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?
Mr. HOAR. Before consent is given, I desire to inquire what will be the order of business after that?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The homestead bill will come up as the unfinished business at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. HALE. I do not think the Senator in charge of the unfinished business would object to the request of the Senator from Texas if he were here.

Mr. MILLS. If there is objection, I shall not take the floor.
Mr. HOAR. I do not rise to object, but to learn what is to be the order of business later in the day. Is it the purpose of the Senate after the Senator from Texas concludes to go on with the homestead bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. So far as the Chair is advised, that will be the order of busines

Mr. HOAR. I do not think that that bill should stand from day to day having precedence over all other business and at the same time not to be taken up. I do not object to the Senator from Texas proceeding, but I should like to have it understood that when he concludes the homestead bill is to be taken up and proceeded with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will lay that bill before the Senate as the unfinished business at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. FRYE. Then let the request of the Senator from Texas be put in a little different form—that at 2 o'clock the unfinished business shall be temporarily laid aside in order that he may complete

Mr. MILLS. It is all the same thing. There is no objection to Mr. FRYE. It is air the same thing.

Mr. FRYE. It is hardly the same thing.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered. The Senator from Texas will proceed.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, on the 18th day of December last the Committee on Foreign Relations agreed to report to the senator of the United States a joint resolution recognizing the independence. the United States a joint resolution recognizing the independence of the Republic of Cuba. On the morning of the 19th of December a statement was given to the public press by authority of the Secretary of State, challenging the authority of the Congress of the United States to deal with that question. He stated that in order to allay misapprehension and injurious results that might follow at home and abroad he thought it his duty to announce to the world that the President had the "exclusive" right to deal with the question of the recognition of a foreign state, and that if both Houses of Congress should pass a joint resolution recognizing the independence of a foreign state, and it should be vetoed by the President and then be passed by a two-thirds majority over the President's veto, then be passed by a two-thirds majority over the Fresident's veto, the law would be inoperative and of no effect.

I propose to meet that contention. It is an extraordinary contention, and this is the second time in the history of the Republic that it has been presented. When it was first presented, it met with a signal rebuke by the Congress of the United States, and I have the content of the doubt not it will meet with the same rebuke now. Where the distinguished Secretary obtains his authority I know not. The Congress of the United States and the executive department are both the creations of the Constitution. Whatever authority the President and the Secretary of State have comes from the words of that great charter, either by an express provision or by a just of that great charter, either by an express provision or by a just and necessary implication from an express provision.

The Constitution of the United States gives the President the power to appoint an ambassador to a foreign government, but the foreign government must exist before the President can appoint an ambassador or a minister. The Constitution gives the President power to appoint to an office, but the office must be created before the President can appoint, and the power to create an office in this Government is vested in the legislative department of the Government, and so far as the relations of the people of the United States are concerned, the power to create a foreign of the United States are concerned, the power to create a foreign government rests with the Congress of the United States, for the power to recognize its existence is the power to create our relations with it.

I will not stop, Mr. President, further to discuss the constitutional provisions, but I will deal with some of the precedents that have provisions, but I will deal with some of the precedents that have been made for us by the illustrious men who have gone before us. The Secretary says that it is an "exclusive right" and power of the President, and the President alone, and in order to allay disturbances abroad and in the United States he feels constrained to say to all the world that the Congress of the United States has no power to deal with this question. This is a most remarkable statement. The great respect I have for the Secretary personally, and for his high position, and the respect I have for his chief, and the for his high position, and the respect I have for his chief, and the high station he fills, forbid me to say more. He has his duty to perform and I have mine, and however high his station I will not refrain from criticising him when in my judgment he has gone beyond the boundaries assigned him by the Constitution and laws of the United States.

In 1822, after the provinces of Spain on this hemisphere had been in revolt about twelve years, the House of Representatives called upon President Monroe for information, if any existed in the Department of State, in reference to the condition of those provinces, whether they were ready to be admitted into the family of nations. President Monroe did not say to the Congress, "This is none of your business; this is my 'exclusive right' and power, and you are inquiring about something as to which you have no authority to speak or to judge." He did nothing of the sort. March 8, 1822, he sent his message in response to the inquiry of Congress, and he says to the Senate and House of Representatives:

In transmitting to the House of Representatives the documents called for by the resolution of that House of the 30th January, I consider it my duty to invite the attention of Congress to a very important subject and to communicate the sentiments of the Executive on it, that, should Congress entertain similar sentiments, there may be such cooperation between the two departments of the Government as their respective rights and duties may require.

He seemed to understand that Congress had something to say about the recognition of the independence of a nation. He seemed to understand that both the executive and the legislative branches had a duty imposed upon them by the Constitution. He seemed to understand that they had to act in cooperation in this work, and after giving his views about the situation, after recommending to Congress, according to his views, that those provinces were entitled to be received into the family of nations, he does not say "I have recognized their existence; I have sent ambassadors to them; I have received their ambassadors." No. He says, in concluding, after giving his views:

Should Congress concur in the view herein presented, they will doubtless

Should Congress concur in the view herein presented, they will doubtless see the propriety of making the necessary appropriations for carrying it into effect.

Mr. GRAY. From whom does the Senator read? Mr. MILLS. I was reading from the message Mr. MILLS. I was reading from the message of President Monroe of the 8th of March, 1822.

When this communication of the Executive was sent to Congress it was referred to a committee, the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives. That committee reported on the resolution, and they say:

Your committee having thus considered the subject referred to them in all its aspects, are unanimously of opinion that it is just and expedient to acknowledge the independence of the several nations of Spanish America without any reference to the diversity in the form of their governments; and in accordance with this opinion they respectfully submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives concur in the opinion expressed by the President in his message of the 8th of March, 1822, that the American provinces of Spain which have declared their independence and are in the enjoyment of it ought to be recognized by the United States as independent nations.

Resolved, That the Committee of Western 2.2.

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill appropriating a sum not exceeding $100,000 to enable the President to give due effect to such recognition.

How, in the face of this precedent, can the President and the Secretary of State now stand before the American people and say that the lawmaking power of this Government has no right to speak as to the recognition of a foreign state with which the people of the United States have to enter into commercial and other relations?

If this, sir, were the only precedent, they would be estopped by it. The President of the United States in 1822 did not recognize the independence of these States until he was fully authorized by the Congress to do it. In the law which they passed on the 4th day of May, 1822, Congress made the appropriations required according to the recommendation of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. On the 18th day of May, only a short time after, the President recognized the independence of Granada, Venezuela, and Ecuador. On May 27, 1823, he recognized the independence of Buenos Ayres, Chile, and Mexico. On the 26th day of May, 1824, he recognized the independence of Brazil, and on the 2d day of May, 1826, John Quincy Adams, his successor in the Presidential chair, carrying into effect the same provision of the statute of May 4, 1822, recognized Peru as an independent nation.

In all these instances the President cooperated with Congress, believing that Congress could rightfully pass upon the expediency and policy of recognizing the independence of a foreign state, and when Congress had passed upon that as a fact then it was his duty to accept that fact as conclusive, and to carry it into execution by appointing and receiving the necessary ambassadors and by making treaties with those governments.

Now, sir, there is another instance in our history, and that is as to the great State one of whose public servants I am in this body. On the 2d day of March, 1836, the representatives of the people of Texas, then a State in the federal union of the United States of Mexico, met and declared their independence. On the 21st day of April her armies met in battle array the armies of the parent State and overwhelmed them with defeat and captured the President of the Mexican Republic. On the 18th day of June, 1836, Henry Clay offered a resolution in the House of Representatives providing for taking the initiatory steps toward the recognition of the independence of Texas. Andrew Jackson was then President of the United States. It was not a joint resolution. It did not propose to bind by force. It simply expressed the opinion of the people of the United States, speaking through their Repre-sentatives and Senators. Andrew Jackson did not say that he had the exclusive right to deal with the question; and he always maintained that the executive department had the right to construe the Constitution for itself. But Andrew Jackson maintained that it was the prerogative of Congress to determine the expediency of the recognition of a foreign State, and it was the duty of the Executive to cooperate.

On December 21, 1836, after both Houses of Congress had passed this separate resolution—the resolution offered by Mr. Clay—the President said to the Senate of the United States:

During the last session information was given to Congress by the Executive that measures had been taken to ascertain "the political, military, and civil condition of Texas." I now submit for your consideration extracts from the report of the agent who had been appointed to collect it relative to the condition of that country. No steps have been taken by the Executive toward the acknowledgment of the independence of Texas; and the whole subject would have been left without further remark on the information now given to Congress were it not that the two Houses at their last session, acting separately, passed resolutions "that the independence of Texas ought to be acknowledged by the United States whenever satisfactory information should be received that it had in successful operation a civil government capable of performing the duties and fulfilling the obligations of an independent power."

Now, the difference between President Jackson and President Monroe was that President Monroe and Congress concurred that the condition had been reached when the foreign States ought to be acknowledged. Congress, in the instance of General Jackson, said that Texas had reached that condition, but General Jackson did not believe it. Here was a severe test to the old warrior. He did not believe the time had come when the United States ought to acknowledge the independence of Texas. He was a man of strong will power. His convictions were strong and deep. His reliance upon their correctness made him almost immovable. But he, like President Monroe, felt that the two branches of governments. ernment ought to move harmoniously together. Hear what he

The acknowledgment of a new state as independent and entitled to a place in the family of nations is at all times an act of great delicacy and responsibility; but more especially so when such state has forcibly separated itself from another of which it had formed an integral part and which still claims dominion over it. A premature recognition under these circumstances, if not looked upon as justifiable cause of war, is always liable to be regarded as a proof of an unfriendly spirit to one of the contending parties. All questions relative to the government of foreign nations, whether of the old or New World, have been treated by the United States as questions of fact only, and our predecessors have cautiously abstained from deciding upon them until the clearest evidence was in their possession to enable them not only to decide correctly but to shield their decisions from every unworthy imputation.

Nor has any deliberate inquiry ever been instituted in Congress or in any of our legislative bodies as to whom belonged the power of originally recognizing a new state—a power the exercise of which is equivalent, under some circumstances, to a declaration of war, a power nowhere expressly delegated, and only granted in the Constitution, as it is necessarily involved in some of the great powers given to Congress; in that given to the President and Senate to form treaties with foreign powers and to appoint ambassadors and other public ministers; and in that conferred upon the President to receive ministers from foreign nations.

Having thus discharged my duty by presenting with simplicity and directness the views which, after much reflection I have been led to take of this important subject, I have only to add the expression of my confidence that if Congress shall differ with me upon it their judgment will be the result of dispassionate, prudent, and wise deliberation, with the assurance that during the short time I shall continue connected with the Government I shall promptly and cordially unite with you in such measure as may be deemed best fitted to increase the prosperity and perpetuate the peace of our favored country.

I call the attention of the Senate particularly to these words:

In the preamble to the resolution of the House of Representatives it is distinctly intimated that the expediency of recognizing the independence of Texas should be left to the decision of Congress. In this view, on the ground of expediency, I am disposed to concur.

That is what I have stated in the resolution now under consideration. The question of the expediency of recognition of a foreign state is within the province of Congress and not with the Executive. That, General Jackson says, is his opinion; that, the House of Representatives said, was its opinion; that, the House of Representatives said, was its opinion; that, the Senate of the United States said, was its opinion. And, going still further, General Jackson's message, in December, 1836—

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator from Texas read the sentence just following the one last read, separated by a semicolon?

Mr. MILLS. Will the Senator just read it? I have closed the beek.

Mr. GRAY. Shall I read it?
Mr. MILLS. Yes.
Mr. GRAY. I will read the whole sentence, repeating the part the Senator has read:

In this view, on the ground of expediency, I am disposed to concur; and do not, therefore, consider it necessary to express any opinion as to the strict constitutional right of the Executive, either apart from or in conjunction with the Senate, over the subject.

Mr. MILLS. The first sentence embraced the whole, that on the question of expediency he concurred.

Mr. CHILTON. If my colleague will read a little further, he will find a still further recognition of that doctrine in the same

Mr. MILLS. I think I will put the whole of it in my speech. It is well in these days to go back to General Jackson and read all he says.

Mr. GRAY. It is.

Mr. MILLS. In order to emphasize this still further, Robert J. Mr. MILLS. In order to emphasize this still further, Robert J. Walker, then a Senator from the State of Mississippi, afterwards in the Cabinet of President Polk as Secretary of the Treasury, and one of the most distinguished men this country ever produced, introduced a resolution in the Senate of the United States January 12, 1837, which I shall read. General Jackson's message was in December, 1836.

The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That the State of Texas having established and maintained an independent Government, capable of performing those duties, foreign and domestic, which appertain to independent governments, and it appearing that there is no longer any reasonable prospect of the successful prosecution of the war by Mexico against said State, it is expedient and proper, and in conformity with the laws of nations, and the practice of this Government in like cases, that the independent political existence of said State be acknowledged by the Government of the United States.

Submitted January 12, 1837.

That resolution was adopted by the Senate, and then, on the 3d day of March, 1837—

Mr. HALE. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VILAS in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. MILLS. Certainly.
Mr. HALE. Was the resolution cited by the Senator as having been submitted by the then Senator from Mississippi, Mr. Robert J. Walker, a joint resolution?

Mr. MILLS. No, sir; I said it was a Senate resolution.

Mr. GRAY. It was an expression of opinion.

Mr. MILLS. It was a Senate resolution.

Mr. HALE. Does it in terms, like the resolution reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, declare an assertion of the Republic of Texas, or is it only an expression that it should be recognized by the Government? The resolutions reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which the Senator is a member, in terms assume the whole thing. I have found nowhere any resolution of either branch-

Mr. MILLS. I hope the Senator from Maine will let me proceed and answer me hereafter.

Mr. HALE. I will not interrupt the Senator. I do not propose, I will say, to take part at the present time in the debate.

Mr. MILLS. The Senator is proposing to answer my argument.

Mr. HALE. I wanted to call attention to the fact. Then I wished the Senator also to state by what yote the Walker resolution—a mere expression of opinion in a Senate resolution—passed ton—a mere expression of opimion in a Senate resolution—passed that great body.

Mr. MILLS. By a vote of 23 to 19.

Mr. HALE. Has the Senator looked—

Mr. MILLS. But, in a republican government, Mr. Jefferson said that a majority of 1 is as good as if the whole body were unanimous; it is the expression of the body of the people; and all our institutions stand upon a majority.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will look a little further on, he will find that the least action which took place on the resolution is that and that was the end of it.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the Senator will answer me fully when I get through, and not attempt to answer every position that I take

Mr. HALE. I will not interrupt the Senator. But will the Senator allow me to ask him one more question? I do not wish to interfere improperly, but before he leaves this branch of the subject does he purpose to submit to the Senate the action the House of Representatives took?

Mr. MILLS. Upon what?

Mr. HALE. Tree does not be senated as the senated action the senated acti

Mr. HALE. Upon this resolution?
Mr. MILLS. It never was sent to the House of Representatives. It was simply a resolution of the Senate of the United

Mr. HALE. I do not mean the Senate resolution, but upon this subject-matter and the message of President Jackson. I do not ask the Senator to do it; I shall do it myself at some future time.

Mr. MILLS. All right; that is satisfactory.

Mr. HALE. But I ask the Senator if he is going into the House action at the time he cites the Senate action?

Mr. MILLS. If the Senator will possess his soul in patience, I shall show him in the course of the next hour what I am going Mr. HALE. I should like, as the Senator is—

Mr. MILLS. I want to go back to the point where I started. I hope the Senator will not disturb me by questions of this sort. It is not fair in debate—

Mr. HALE. The Senate will judge whether it is a good practice or not

Mr. MILLS. To ask me to state what I am going to say in the next hour

Mr. HALE. I shall not interrupt the Senator further. There

Mr. HALE. I shall not interrupt the Senator turther. There will be ample time to give to the Senate these precedents.

Mr. MILLS. Of course there will be, and no one can do it better than the Senator from Maine. He is thoroughly informed on all these questions and is a gentleman of acknowledged ability. I simply say that when a Senator rises to discuss a question it is not simply say that when a Senator rises to discuss a question it is not proper for others to rise and constantly take his mind from the subject by putting to him a catechism.

Mr. HALE. Certainly it is not, unless he is willing.

Mr. MILLS. It is permitted every day to ask a question of a Senator when he is speaking, but I never have done so in twenty, five years in either House unless on his side of the question, and I could suggest something to him that he would everless as he could suggest something to him that he would overlook as he could suggest something to him that he would overlook as he went along.

To close this point on the history of Texas, Congress passed a law, signed by President Jackson on the 3d day of March, 1837, making provision for the appointment and pay of a representative or minister from the United States to Texas, and that finished the recognition of the independence of Texas by General Jackson, so the history says, in the very last act of his Administration.

Mr. HALE. On what condition was that act passed?

Mr. MILLS. The consular and diplomatic appropriation bill made an appropriation of so much money to pay the expenses of a minister or a diplomatic agent to Texas.

minister or a diplomatic agent to Texas.

Mr. HALE. "Provided." What was the proviso?

Mr. MILLS. Of course, I say, provided the President sends him. I said that this is a coordinative function between the legnim. I said that this is a coordinative function between the legislative and executive departments. I am answering the extraordinary position assumed by the Secretary of State, that this whole question devolves exclusively on the President. I do not deny the President's part in that performance, but I deny his exclusive assumption of all authority over the subject. I will not stop to discuss the question of taste as to the Secretary of State announcing to the world before an act was passed by the Congress that they had not authority to do what they were going to de and that they had not authority to do what they were going to do, and that if they did do it it would produce disaster throughout Christendom.

Mr. MORGAN. May I ask the Senator from Texas whether on that subject

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. MILLS. Oh, certainly.
Mr. MORGAN. Has the Senator examined the report made by Henry Winter Davis?
Mr. MILLS. I have it before me. I will come to it in due order.

Mr. MILLS. I have it before me. I will come to it in due order. This, Mr. President, concludes two memorable instances. The first is the case of President Monroe, one of the noblest men this country ever produced, a man over whose shoulders boards of trade and stock exchanges never threw their tentacles, a man who had led the fighting squadrons of Virginia on many of the fields of the Revolution, and himself had fallen leading his gallant troops on the field at Princeton. He stood for the liberties of his people, and he sympathized with all struggles for liberty all over the world, and especially in this hemisphere, where he maintained that there was a peculiar set of principles adapted to this hemisphere with which Europe should have nothing to do. He was supported by many great men in council, one of whom succeeded him in the Presidency. All the members of his Cabinet doubtless concurred with him in the position he took.

It is something strange at this late day, after so many illustri-

It is something strange at this late day, after so many illustri-ous statesmen in the United States have led the way and marked the jurisdiction of the legislative and executive departments of the jurisdiction of the legislative and executive departments of the Government on this question, that the President in the closing hours of the nineteenth century has just discovered the fact that he alone has control of this whole question, and that he will set Congress at defiance if they dare to pass a joint resolution, and pass it by a two-thirds vote over his veto. Should such an occa-sion ever present itself, this Government will not be wanting in ability to enforce the decisions which are made by the legislative branch of the Government within the jurisdiction given to it by the Constitution.

Mr. President, during the Hungarian revolution in 1848 Zachary Taylor was President of the United States and John M. Clayton, of Delaware, was his Secretary of State. He sent a special agent to Hungary to go among its people secretly and obtain informa-tion of the existing condition of the revolution, and ascertain and report to the President whether the revolution had attained a condition that Hungary ought to be recognized as a member of the family of nations. I will read what Mr. Clayton said to his special agent:

Should the new government prove to be in your opinion firm and stable-Quoting the very language, I believe, of James Monroe-the President will cheerfully—recommend to Congress at their next session the recognition of Hungary, and you might intimate, if you should see fit, that the President would in that event—

What event? In the event that Congress authorized it-in that event be gratifled to receive a diplomatic agent from Hungary in the United States by or before the next meeting of Congress, and that he entertains no doubt whatever that in case her new government should prove to be firm and stable her independence would be speedily recognized by that enlightened body.

He did not say, "Obtain information and I will recognize it;" he did not say, "I have the exclusive authority by the Constitution to recognize or not to recognize;" but he said, "Obtain information, bring it to the State Department," and the President would "make it the basis of a communication to Congress, under the authority given to him by the Constitution to make recommendations to Congress." It will be laid before Congress, its recognition will be recommended by the President, and he had no doubt that that enlightened body would follow his recommendation and authorize him to send and receive ambassadors.

Here are three Administrations proclaiming this doctrine without a challenge. Zachary Taylor died while this agent was abroad. He was succeeded by Millard Fillmore, President of the United States, and John M. Clayton was succeeded by a man whose name stands easily first among the constitutional lawyers of the United States, Daniel Webster. Chevalier Hulsemann arraigned the Government of the United States for unjustly interfering with the local affairs of Austria, and talked somewhat flippantly about the He did not say, "Obtain information and I will recognize it;" he ernment of the United States for unjustly interfering with the local affairs of Austria, and talked somewhat flippantly about the power of Austria. Webster was not of that character of diplomats who use words to conceal ideas. He spoke boldly, he spoke like an American citizen, and when Chevalier Hulsemann intimated that Mr. Mann might be executed as a spy, he did not call on the Government of Austria to know what they would do and pass communications back and forth for ten or fifteen years. He said, "Sir, had you dared to do that, the Government of the United States would have exhausted all its military and naval resources to avenge the deed." He said, "The Government of the United States has a perfect right, by the law of nations, to send a special agent of its own into an insurrectionary country to see and special agent of its own into an insurrectionary country to see and obtain information upon which to act, and you have no right, nor have the House of Austria, to object." When the Austrian minister spoke about the House of Austria and its importance, he said it is but a patch upon the face of the earth as compared to the dimensions of the Republic. And he said in that letter to Hulsemann substantially what Clayton had said. He tells him, "It was only in the event that the new government should appear, in the opinion of the agent, to be firm and stable that the President proposed"—what? To recognize its independence? No. sir: that the President what? To recognize its independence? No, sir; that the President proposed "to recommend its recognition." To whom? To the only body on the face of the globe that had the power to recognize it, the lawmaking power of the Union.

Going on further, here are three illustrious instances to which the Secretary of State and Chief Magistrates of the nation have closed their great.

the Secretary of State and Chief Magistrates of the nation have closed their eyes. When it was proposed to recognize the Republics of Haiti and Liberia, Congress passed a law June 5, 1862, in which it is stated "that the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint diplomatic representatives of the United States to the Republics of Haiti and Liberia, respectively. Each of said representatives so appointed shall be accredited as commissioner," etc.

There was no ambassador sent to either one of those Governments until Congress authorized it by that act.

Subsequently to that time the Republic of Haiti was recognized by this Government in sending a commissioner and consul-general, by this Government in sending a commissioner and consul-general, Mr. Benjamin F. Whidden, July 12, 1862, he having been authorized by the act of June 6, 1862.

Here is evidence enough, conclusive and overwhelming; and up to this period in our history the thought never seemed to have entered the brain of any American statesman that the executive branch of this Government was alone authorized to dispose of this

Now, Mr. President, I reach the year 1864, during the Presidency of Mr. Lincoln, when Mr. Seward was Secretary of State, and this was the first instance in the history of the country when the Secretary claimed that the executive branch of the Government was exclusively empowered to recognize the independence of a foreign state. During the French invasion of Mexico in 1864, when a monarchy was established by military order, and the revolution was progressing by the republicans of Mexico to overthrow it, Mr. Seward wrote a letter to William L. Dayton, who was our minister to France, in which he took the position which Secretary Olney takes to-day. He says:

I send you a copy of a resolution which passed the House of Representa-tives on the 4th instant by unanimous vote, and which declares the opposi-tion of that body to a recognition of a monarchy in Mexico. M. Geofrey has lost no time in asking for an explanation of this proceeding.

Mr. MORGAN. What is the date of that letter?
Mr. MILLS. April 7, 1864. Here was the unanimous declaration of the House of Representatives that they were opposed to the establishment or recognition of a monarchy in this continent, keeping their feet strictly in the paths of their fathers, who said that this hemisphere was dedicated to liberty, secured by governments owing all their just powers to the consent of the governed. Mr. Seward then goes on to say, and Mr. Dayton said it, doubtless, to the prime minister of France in Paris:

less, to the prime minister of France in Paris:

It is hardly necessary, after what I have heretofore written with perfect candor for the information of France, to say that this resolution truly interprets the unanimous sentiment of the people of the United States in regard to Mexico. It is, however, another and distinct question whether the United States would think it necessary or proper to express themselves in the form adopted by the House of Representatives at this time. This is a practical and purely executive question, and the decision of its constitutionality belongs, not to the House of Representatives, nor even to Congress, but to the President of the United States. You will, of course, take notice that the declaration made by the House of Representatives is in the form of a joint resolution, which, before it can acquire the character of a legislative act, must receive, first, the concurrence of the Senate, and secondly, the approval of the President of the United States; or, in case of his dissent, the renewed assent of both Houses of Congress, to be expressed by a majority of two-thirds of each body.

While the President receives the declaration of the House of Representatives with the profound respect to which it is entitled, as an exposition of its sentiments upon a grave and important subject, he directs that you inform the Government of France that he does not at present contemplate any departure from the policy which this Government has hitherto pursued in regard to the war which exists between France and Mexico. It is hardly necessary to say that the proceeding of the House of Representatives was adopted upon suggestions arising within itself, and not upon any communication of the executive department, and that the French Government would be seasonably apprised of any change of policy upon this subject which the President might at any future time think it proper to adopt.

Here is the authority upon which Secretary Olney and the Presi-

The President of the United States submitted the correspondence on a request from the House of Representatives. This correspondence was submitted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives. That committee reported, and I will read an extract from its report:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs have examined the correspondence submitted by the President relative to the joint resolution on Mexican affairs with the profound respect to which it is entitled because of the gravity of its subject and the distinguished source from which it emanated.

They regret that the President should have so widely departed from the usage of constitutional governments as to make a pending resolution of so grave and delicate a character the subject of diplomatic explanations. They regret still more that the President should have thought proper to inform a foreign government of a radical and serious conflict of opinion and jurisdiction between the depositories of the legislative and executive power of the United States.

They learn with surprise that, in the opinion of the President, the form and term of expressing the judgment of the United States on recognizing a monarchical government imposed on a neighboring republic is a "purely executive question, and the decision of it constitutionally belongs, not to the House of Representatives, nor even to Congress, but to the President has ever claimed such an exclusive authority. No Congress

This assumption is equally novel and inadmissible. No President has ever claimed such an exclusive authority. No Congress can ever permit its expression to pass without dissent.

Mr. MORGAN. Before the Senator proceeds to discuss that, I wish to ask if he has any objection to having that entire message and the entire report put into the RECORD as an appendix to his remarks?

Mr. MILLS. None in the world. Mr. MORGAN. I will therefore make that request, and that it also be printed as a document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unless there be objection, it will be ordered to be printed in the RECORD as part of the remarks of the Senator from Texas, and separately printed as a document.

Mr. MILLS. That message of President Lincoln and this cor-

mr. MILLS. That message of President Lincoln and this correspondence was referred, as I have said, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The committee reported, and at the end of their report submitted a resolution, which was not adopted, but was laid upon the table because of an objection to the verbiage of the resolution. Everyone knows how close to the hearts of the people of the United States at that time President Lincoln was, and everyone knows how strong was the hold that Secretary Seward had. The Congress of the United States was almost exclusively Republican in both branches, with only a few Democrats in either body, and they did not feel like using any language that would reflect upon either one of those illustrious chiefs at a time when the country was involved in war-a great civil war, the greatest in the history of the world. But when the objection to the peculiar language of the resolution reported was removed, another resolution was offered affirming the doctrines maintained in this report. That resolution was capable of division, and the proposition being made, it was divided. The first subdivision of that resolution reads as

Resolved, That Congress has a constitutional right to an authoritative voice in declaring and prescribing the foreign policy of the United States as well in the recognition of new powers as in other matters; and it is the constitutional duty of the executive department to respect that policy not less in diplomatic negotiation than in the use of force when authorized by law.

What was the vote on that resolution? Out of 126 members in that body, 118 voted in favor of this resolution and only 8 against it. Does that show to the President or to the Secretary of State, or to anybody else in the country, that Congress was disposed to acquiesce in the decision—first made in 1864—that the executive deacquiesce in the decision—inst made in 1864—that the executive department of this Government alone had the authority to deal with the question of the recognition of a foreign state?

The second branch of that proposition was a rebuke to the Secretary of State for having informed the French Government of the division between the Senate and the House of Representatives and the French Government of the division between the Senate and the House of Representatives. on one side and the Executive on the other, and it read as follows:

And the propriety of any declaration of any foreign policy by Congress is sufficiently proved by the vote which pronounces it: and such proposition while pending and undetermined is not a fit topic of diplomatic explanation with any foreign power.

That was adopted by a vote of 68 to 58, and among those voting for it was a distinguished Republican who afterwards became President of the United States, Mr. Garfield; another I see before me, the venerable father of the body, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Morrill]; and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Allison], who, if the public press is to be believed, is soon himself to be Secretary of State, and a more capable one can not be found within the Republican party in the United States.

Mr. President, I have shown by the long and illustrious line of precedents in the days of the giants of this Republic that no one ever intimated that the President of the United States had the ever intimated that the President of the United States had the exclusive right to recognize or not to recognize the existence of a foreign state, and that when the proposition was first presented, even during the Administration of so great a man and one so strong in the affections of the people of the country as was. Mr. Lincoln, and in a time of war, the Congress of the United States, with almost absolute unanimity, denounced it; and I hope it will meet with no better fate now. Congress has the power, as General Jackson said and as the resolution said, to determine the question of expediency, and the Executive has the power when that is determined, and it is his duty, as President Jackson said, to act in harmony with the legislative department of the Government, and go forward and finish the joint act, the power to perform which is conferred by the Constitution upon the two branches of the Government. Government.

But, Mr. President, it may be said there are instances, and numerous ones, where the President has acknowledged the independence of foreign states without the intervention of Congress. Yes, when there was no question, when it followed as a matter of course, when a dynasty was overthrown and a new government instituted within an hour, our ministers have been authorized by the President to acknowledge the new government. When Dom Pedro was overthrown in a revolution that began and was finished record was overthrown in a revolution that began and was finished in five or six hours, he accepted the result of the revolution, took his family on board a ship, and announced to the people of Brazil that he was going to Portugal never to return. There could be no question whether the new government should be acknowledged or not; and its independence was acknowledged by the action of the executive department of the Government; but all that only shows that when the President, as the head of the executive department, assumes such a responsibility, he assumes it upon the supposition that the act is so confessedly just and right that the Congress will support him, just as it will in the case of a gallant naval officer off in a foreign country who sees a citizen of the United States spired by the armed shire of author supports. gallant naval officer off in a foreign country who sees a citizen of the United States seized by the armed ship of another government. He can not stop to report if he knows a citizen of the United States is going to be slaughtered; he can not legitimately make war, for that can only be done by a declaration of Congress; but he knows what his armed ship is scouring the seas for. He knows that it is for the protection of the citizens and the commerce of the United States.

It is that for which his flag is floating on the ocean. He is sent there for that purpose. When such a case occurred, what did the gallant old commodores, such as we had many long years ago, do? I believe they have not degenerated, for I believe we have as gallant a set of officers in our Navy now as ever stood on the quarter-deek of any vessel of any power on the earth. In Jefferson's ter-deek of any vessel of any power on the earth. In Jefferson's Administration, when the pirates had been levying tribute on the commerce of all the maritime powers who navigated the Mediterranean Sea, one of our old tars said he wanted to pay his tribute from the mouths of his cannon; and this Republic, which barely had come into existence on the Western Hemisphere, was the first power which laid down the principle that tribute would not be paid to the pirates of the Mediterranean, and that where we had a right to go we would go by force.

I recall a memorable instance in our history. I have often spoken of it. It is one of the brightest and most illustrious pages that has ever been written in our history. During that same Hungarian insurrection of which I spoke a poor fellow who had taken a part in that insurrection, and who had seen the fall and ruin of his country, fled to the United States. He declared his intention to become a citizen of this Government; he had renounced allegiance to all foreign princes and potentates on the earth; he had sworn he would bear true faith and allegiance to the Government of the United States, and defend it against all enemies and opposers. The contract was made that invested him with the robe of citizenship of the United States. He went back to Smyrna, a neutral power belonging to Turkey, was seized by an Austrian officer, and taken on board of an Austrian man-of-war. His papers entitled him to the protection of that flag that we call "Old Glory." Commodore Ingraham happened to be there with one of our ships, the St. Louis. Around him were five armed war ships of Austria. Knowing that this man was a citizen entitled to our protection, though knowing that he was not authorized to make war, yet he battened down his hatches, sanded his decks. make war, yet he battened down his hatches, sanded his decks, shotted his guns to the lips, laid his vessel broadside to the Austrian vessel in whose hold Martin Koszta lay bound, and said: "I will give you until 4 o'clock to-day to release him, and if you do not release him, I will force his release." He was released. Commodore Ingraham, in reporting to the Secretary of the Navy, who called on him because Austria had complained of his conduct, said:

I know, sir, I have taken a fearful responsibility upon myself by this act; but after Mr. Brown had informed me Koszta had taken the oath of allegiance to the United States and forsworn all allegiance to Austria; that he was an American citizen, and had been under the protection of the legation at Constantinople, I could not hesitate to believe he was fully entitled to protection. It was a case of life and death, for if Koszta had been taken to Trieste, his fate was sealed; and could I have looked the American people in the face again if I had allowed a citizen to be executed, and not used the power in my hands to protect him, for fear of doing too much?

He was not authorized to levy war, but he knew what his ship was at Smyrna for, he knew what it was on the high seas for, and he knew what that flag symbolized when it floated at the masthead of an armed vessel of the United States. He knew that he must protect the citizens of the United States, and he did protect the conduct to the Secretary of the Navy, who must protect the citizens of the United States, and he did protect them, and reported his conduct to the Secretary of the Navy, who said, "You did right, and I approve of everything you did."

So it is, sir, about the recognition of a foreign government without the intervention of Congress. So Mr. Jefferson thought when he purchased Louisiana. He said he was not authorized to purchase any territory. Mr. Jefferson was a strict constructionist, and he did not believe that the Constitution of the United States authorized the acquisition of foreign territory. He believed that the power to admit new States meant the power to admit them out of territory then belonging to the United States. But here was territory that was vital to the very existence of republican government about to pass out of the power of a weak, decaying, and dying monarchy into the hands of the most powerful monarchy in the world. Mr. Jefferson stepped in and said to Napoleon Bonaparte that he would fight him on all the waters of the earth before he would permit him to take possession of Louisiana and before he would permit him to take possession of Louisiana and the mouth of the Mississippi River. Mr. Jefferson then offered $15,000,000 for Louisiana, which Napoleon took, and Mr. Jefferson then reported his action to Congress.

No, Mr. President, if there is a question raised, if Congress assumes that it has a right to speak and claims it, the President can not act until Congress has passed upon the expediency of the

Here I leave this question and take up the question that follows. Congress having the power to recognize a foreign state, should it now recognize the existence of the Republic of Cuba? Why not? Cuba has a government; she has a president; she has a legislative assembly; she has courts; she has officers collecting the revenue; and I see by a statement just made by a gentleman who is soon to be a member of this body, already elected, who has been to Cuba, that the Cuban Republic even compels Spain to pay taxes to that Government, and that even General Weyler has to pay his share of such taxation. Nothing purchased in the island outside of Habana enters that city which does not pay taxes to the Republic before it enters the Spanish lines. All of the flour, beef, bananas, potatoes, every vegetable which appears on the table; every cigar that is smoked by General Weyler, if produced in Cuba, pays taxes to the Government of the Republic of Cuba, of which Mr. Cisneros is president. Here is a Government in full operation, levying taxes, administering the laws, ment in full operation, levying taxes, administering the laws, raising and supporting armies, fighting battles, and still the President says it is not ready for recognition. He tells us that it occupies two-thirds of the territory of the island—if he had said occupies two-thirds of the territory of the Island in his and nine-tenths he would have been more accurate—and the Secretary of State says it occupies two-thirds of the territory. The distinguished gentleman soon to be here as a colleague of my friend from Mississippi [Mr. Walthall] says, I believe, that the armed power of Spain can not get 25 miles from Habana without going out and making a raid and running back again for shelter; and yet the President thinks that because the Cubans do not come out and give nitched battle to the Spaniards they are not worthy of and give pitched battle to the Spaniards they are not worthy of recognition! The Cubans fight in their own way. The Cubans do not fight without arms and without munitions of war to enable the Spaniards to take them all and shoot them to death. They fight so as to break down the power of Spain; they fight in the only way they can fight; and they fight to the death. The same criticism, however, might have been made by the President if he had lived two thousand years ago. He might have said that Rome had no government because Fabius would not fight Hannibal in open battle when Hannibal was encamped around the walls of Rome for seventeen years. The historian says Fabius baffled Hannibal by refusing to fight until Rome got ready to give battle in her own way; and when she did it was in Africa, where she overturned the government of Carthage and destroyed Hannibal and his army.

Now, we are told that Cuba is not to be recognized because she does not go out without arms in her hands, when she has only ten or fifteen or twenty thousand to fight one hundred or two hun-dred thousand; and the President says—and I suppose he is a great military genius—if they will do that the whole thing can be settled right off, and we should have peace in our neighboring nation. Yes, they could; but how is Cuba to obtain arms? How is she to obtain munitions of war? She can not build a ship like the South American provinces. Their armies had a vast extent of territory to go over. They could drive Spain and her armies; they could beat them occasionally; they could obtain munitions of war, but beat them occasionally; they could obtain munitions of war, but Cuba is surrounded by a chain of fire, surrounded by Spanish gunboats, which are constantly going in and out of all her ports. She can only obtain munitions of war by occasionally passing by the gunboats and running in and slipping in the munitions, which are obtained by the friends of Cuba in the United States; but while the armed forces of Spain are found around that island, keeping the Cubans from getting anything with which to defend their lives, the President of the United States has so administered the neutrality laws of this Government as to make his Administration a devoted friend of Spain. The Spaniards compliment and praise a devoted friend of Spain. The Spaniards compliment and praise him. I do not envy the President while he enjoys their enco-I do not envy him the tributes he receives from Castellar and Weyler, men who curse and denounce the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States and the people of the United States, while they laud the President with praises for his

The neutrality laws of the United States only bind the Administration to prevent the sailing of armed expeditions, and over and over and over again has it been ruled that the sailing of a vessel with arms and munitions of war is no violation of the neutrality laws of the United States, nor is it a violation of the neutrality laws of other countries. We have the neutrality laws passed in the Administration of President Monroe; and not only has it been held that arms and munitions could be shipped, but it has been held that an armed ship may be sent to insurgents lawfully by the laws of nations, only it has to run the peril of being captured by the enemy. Whenever the insurgents in Cuba come to the United States to buy arms and munitions with which to defend their liberties and to save themselves from destruction, they have to apply to the customs officer when their boat is loaded. The customs officer telegraphs to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the telegraphs orders from the Treasury are made public. He telegraphs orders from the Treasury to the customs The neutrality laws of the United States only bind the Admin-and the telegrams to the Secretary of the Treasury are made public. He telegraphs orders from the Treasury to the customs officer, "Let the ship go, on her stating that she is going from a certain port to a certain port." That information is given to Spain by the public press, and Spain's gunboats can go to that port or seize the vessel on the way.

Is that fair and just? Would it be fair and just with any people of the earth outside of this hemisphere? President Washington in his Farewell Address to the people of the United States cautioned them against favoritism to governments, cautioned them against partialities. Neutrality means impartiality; means that all shall be treated alike; and yet the whole course of the policy of the present Administration in this Cuban struggle has been to strengthen the power of Spain and hasten the hour of the been to strengthen the power of Spain and hasten the hour of the destruction of the insurrection in Cuba. The President says in his message that the question of granting them belligerent rights is now no longer urged. Where did the distinguished Chief Magistrate of the nation get that remarkable information? He did not get it from Congress. Congress passed a law or a concurrent resolution, which is the expression of its opinion, and it is upon the statute book yet. If it were no longer urged, somebody would offer a resolution to repeal it on the ground that we had made a mistake; but instead of retracing our steps of last year, Congress is proposing to advance. I do not know where the President got that remarkable information. He did not get it from the people of the United States. The people of the United States are repub-licans and democrats in the broadest sense of both those terms. They believe in a government of the people founded on the consent of the governed. They are opposed to monarchy; they have no sympathy with Spain. Ninety-nine out of every hundred patriots in the United States deeply and profoundly sympathize with the insurrection in Cuba. It may be possible that the boards of trade, the stock exchanges, and the commercial clubs of the great exporting cities on the Atlantic Seaboard and in the North and West have had access to his ears and given him that information.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator will allow me to say that the Mr. MORGAN. The Senator will allow me to say that the Committee on Foreign Relations, when they first passed on this question, had before them resolutions adopted by, I think, not less than fifty boards of trade in the United States, urging the recognition of the belligerency of the Cuban insurgents.

Mr. MILLS. They do not do it now; they have gone back; because I have received communications from some of them, and some very interesting letters from some of the distinguished comsome very interesting letters from some of the distinguished commercial gentlemen in the United States, criticising me for the part I have taken. They say: "Business has just begun to revive, and now you are going on tearing it all to pieces again; you want to bring on war. What have we got to do with Cuba? We are exporting and importing to Cuba; we are making money. Let us alone." It is this mercantile spirit in this country that is fighting against its honor. The President says we ought to do the right thing; not to use might, but to use right; and he speaks in his message of what we owe to Spain. We owe to Spain a certain duty that we ought to observe. He says:

Deferring the choice of ways and methods until the time for action arrives, we should make them depend upon the precise conditions then existing; and they should not be determined upon without giving careful heed to every consideration involving our honor and interest or the international duty we owe to Snain.

Do we owe no duty to the poor, struggling people whom Spain is butchering every hour? We have said for one hundred years, and we say it to-day, and the President repeats it in this very message, that we will let no other power interfere in Cuba. We will not let them go and assume a protectorate over that island. We have so said; we have shut them out from all houses of refuge; we have condemned them to slavery and to the despotism of the assassin who occupies the throne of Spain. We have done it; and we repeat it day by day, and yet shall we sit still in the Senate and in the House of Representatives and in the Executive chair of this nation and talk about our duty to Spain? We owe no duties to a despot, except the duties that we have covenanted in treaties that we have and with her and which shake presidents. that we have made with her, and which she has persistently refused to execute.

that we have made with her, and which she has persistently refused to execute.

We owe a duty to the people of Cuba. We said in the very beginning of our history that Cuba should remain under the dominion of Spain. We said no other European Government should acquire it. We said France should not have Louisiana, and we compelled her to sell it to us. We took the same ground with reference to Florida in 1811. We were then in a condition of quasi war with England and France. It was apprehended by our people that Great Britain was trying to get possession of Florida. On the 3d of January, 1811, Mr. Madison sent a message to Congress in which he said the country east of the Perdido River was so intimately connected with the security and tranquillity of the United States that he asked Congress to say by a declaration "that the United States could not see, without serious inquietude, that country pass from the hands of Spain into that of any other foreign power." Congress passed the act, and authorized him to take forcible possession of the territory, which he did, and occupied it with the Army, notwithstanding Spain was the proprietor of the territory; and from that day on to the day when the gallant Colonel Monroe, as President of the United States, threw the gauntlet of the young Republic at the feet of the Holy Alliance and dared them to lift it have we said that this hemisphere was not to be dominated by European influence.

President Washington said in his Farewell Address that Europe not to be dominated by European influence.

President Washington said in his Farewell Address that Europe had a set of primary interests that did not concern us; that we should not entangle ourselves with them. When he sent his minister to negotiate the treaty of 1795, France and Spain proposed to the United States to enter into a triple alliance or tripartite treaty to guarantee the possession of Spain to all those provinces on this hemisphere. The proposition was instantly spurned, and for a hundred years that proposition has been made by France. for a hundred years that proposition has been made by France and England and Spain to the United States, and on every occasion it has been refused. We have refused to consider it or to talk about it. We have said: "This hemisphere belongs to the people in this country. Your interests are different from our interests; you have a set of interests and we have a set of interests wholly different. You have monarchies; we have republics. You have a balance of power by which, with vast standing armies, you maintain each other's boundaries, and by which you ally these great powers together to prevent a strong power from obliterating those boundaries and extending its dominion; we have nothing of the sort. You have colonization schemes; we know nothing about colonization. Under the Constitution of our country all territory which is acquired is acquired for the purpose of forming an equal State in the Union, with its Senators and Rep-resentatives. Your system is not our system."

That thing has been repeated by Jefferson and Madison and Monroe and John Quincy Adams. Daniel Webster, Clayton, Crittenden, Clay, all of our great statesmen have repeated it, and we stand on it to-day, and it is by virtue of that declaration that we say to all foreign governments, "You shall not take that island from Spain. Our safety demands it, not yours. These people must be sacrificed, but our safety demands that the island shall not pass out of the dominion of Spain. It lies close to our shores. It commands the mouth of the Gulf of Mexico, which washes the shores of five of our States. Into that great holy of water are It commands the mouth of the Gulf of Mexico, which washes the shores of five of our States. Into that great body of water are poured the tributary streams that ramify the whole country. We can not permit it to go into the dominion of any other power except the poor and dying power that holds it merely as a tenant at will. We are the residuary legatees of that estate. The time is coming when we will take it. We have a right to grow just as you have a right to grow."

We ought to read the magnificent letter of Edward Everett, wherein he asked the British and French ministers, when they proposed to enter into a tripartite agreement to maintain the wherein he asked the British and French ministers, when they proposed to enter into a tripartite agreement to maintain the sovereignty of Spain to Cuba: "How would you feel if there were an island at the mouth of the Thames or of the Seine that commanded the entrance to your capital, and if we, in the United States, who have no interest in Europe, should come and propose that that island, by a tripartite agreement, supported by the armed powers of those three powerful States, should remain in the hands of some one you can not control?"

armed powers of those three powerful States, should remain in the hands of some one you can not control?"

Cuba is in chains! Cuba is under a sentence of life condemnation! We talk about slavery. We talk about what we have done. We have deluged our land to blot it from our own continent when our own souls are defiled by the slavery that now exists in Cuba, and a just God will call us to account for it. We can not stand and see these people butchered—men, women, and children—their arms and legs torn from them; raids made into the cities, and unoffending citizens of every age and condition taken out and shot to death, and we still say we can not interfere. "We put you there. We will keep you there. You shall not go to England, who is ready to take you at any moment. You shall not go to Germany, who is ready to take you, and powerful enough to do so. You shall not go to France. You shall stay in your dungeon until Spain shoots you to death." And then, in their death struggle, in a war in which the motto is "Independence or extermination," we are throwing the whole power of this Administration in the interest of the monarchy of Spain.

the interest of the monarchy of Spain.

Mr. President, we owe something to our own people, as my distinguished friend the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Morgan] said awhile ago, in conjunction with the debt we owe to the poor, oppressed people of Cuba. The President says that the people of the United States look with wonder and admiration—wonder and admiration!-upon the monstrous armaments that are leaving Spain; upon the monstrous resources which she is pouring into this terrible and unequal conflict; upon the gigantic number of soldiers which she is concentrating upon that island for its desolation and the extermination of its people; that we, a people whose liberty has been bought with the sacrifice of our fathers and their blood; that been bought with the sacrifice of our fathers and their blood; that we who have erected, as a gift from a free people, a statue of Liberty upon our borders, naming it Liberty Enlightening the World, look with wonder and admiration upon the tremendous resources of Spain sent to that country to annihilate the poor, defenseless, unarmed people of Cuba. For my part, I repudiate the statement. I look with horror and indignation on it, and if I had the place which the President has, I would call upon the Congress of the United States to give me the power to take the armed fleets of this Government to Habana, and I would there protect the people of the United States or I would reduce those fortresses to a mass of the United States or I would reduce those fortresses to a mass of mortar and ruin. [Applause in the galleries.]

Why are not our own people protected? There can not be any question about that point. Why is it that in this age when the press is running in every direction over the earth to get information to distribute to the brains of the American people, a newspaper correspondent without a penknife, with a certificate in his received showing that he is a newspaper correspondent without a penknife, with a certificate in his paper correspondent without a penknife, with a certificate in his pocket showing that he is a newspaper correspondent, with a certificate showing that he takes no part in the armed insurrection on the island, is taken out, strung up between two trees, and a squadron of cavalry rides by—at a dash—a gallant dash—and hews his flesh from his bones with machetes? Then what do we do? What does this great Republic do? She writes a note, and that note calls upon another officer to write another note, and, as poor Sanguilly said, it is words, words, words. Lying in prison in violation of the provisions of the treaty of 1877 for a year, and now condemned to perpetual imprisonment! Words! Why can not we demand of Spain that the perpetrators of this vile deed under Spain shall be punished? Why call upon Spain for words?

By military order when Sanguilty was captured, he was con-demned, I believe, to be shot or to be transported for life to the penal colony in Africa. The sentence was one or the other. Our Government called the attention of the Spanish Government to the fact that by treaty he must be tried by the civil courts. The civil courts in Cuba! They have had the laws of the machete since 1825. Cuba has no courts but the courts that are decreed from the mouth of the Captain-General. "Well," Spain said, "if that will relieve you, all right." The judgment of the court at Madrid is set aside. The prisoner is ordered back to trial in Cuba by the civil courts, and a civil court is the creature of Weyler, and when the time comes for the trial, he takes out the only witness who can prove that the man was a noncombatant, the only witwho can prove that the man was a noncombatant, the only witness who can prove his innocence, and boldly shoots him to death, and imprisons the atttorney who defends him—and then brings the prisoner up for trial and, without any evidence, repeats the same condemnation. Then, what does our Government do? Some more words, words, words. They say, "He has been tried according to treaty. He has been tried by the civil courts. There is nothing to do now except to stand by and see an American shot to death for nothing." I say, Oh to God that we had one hour of Franklin Pierce, William L. Marcy, and Commander Ingraham! I say it is the duty of the Government of the United States to see that her citizen has a fair trial upon the merits of the accusation made against him, and to take some part in that controversy hermade against him, and to take some part in that controversy herself to see whether or not he is punished justly; and I care nothing about the verdicts of the courts of Spain or the courts of any other country on earth. If the citizen of the United States, in the judgment of his own Government, has violated no law, if he does not merit the punishment prescribed by a foreign government, I would make the atmosphere around Madrid smell of sulphur for

As I said about Govin a while ago, he was a newspaper correspondent for the Journal, I understand. He went there properly accredited, intending to go into the lines and among the people to get information. He had his papers showing that he was a newspaper correspondent for the Journal, I understand. get information. He had his papers showing that he was a newspaper man. He did not even have a penknife, and yet he was taken off and cut to pieces; and when called on for an explanation Weyler said he was wounded in battle one day and died of his wounds the next day, while other American citizens saw him strung between two trees and a charging squadron of cavalry come up and cut him to pieces with machetes. Is that satisfactory? It was not satisfactory to General Lee. He called for more information, and there were more words. He told the Captain-General that there must be some mistake; that he must have given him the case of some other person; that it was not the case of Govin. The Captain-General said no more except that his general said the man was taken in a battle that nobody ever heard of, and that he was severely wounded and died of his wounds the next day.

Then we fold our arms, and our representative at Habana asks, "What else can we do? I have pursued the inquiry until the Captain-General says the man is dead, and that he died from his wounds," when witnesses say he never was in battle and he never was wounded until he was wounded by the machete in the hands

If it were not for the boards of trade and the stock exchanges and the commercial gamblers in the great cities who are interested in the exports and imports, it might be possible for the Government of the United States to show some virility all over the earth when the lives of its citizens and their persons are in danearth when the lives of its citizens and their persons are in danger. Now they are trying to scare the Congress of the United States with the tremendous power of Italy. Signor Crispi has declared, for the delectation of the American people, that Italy would regard it as a very serious complication of foreign affairs if we should recognize the independence of the people of Cuba. Who is Signor Crispi? There was a day when the Roman name was known throughout the whole earth. There was a time when it was feared by barbarians and loved by all those living within the protection of its flags. There was a day when the eagle rode in triumph before its conquering legions, from the Danube to the Indian Ocean. There was a day when the eagle was the symbol of Indian Ocean. There was a day when the eagle was the symbol of her power. But that day has passed, and the symbol of her power. But that day has passed, and the symbol of the power of Italy to-day is a monkey and an organ grinder. [Laughter.]

Now, if Signor Crispi takes offense at the action of the Congress of the United States, and in conjunction with Spain he is desirous to make a holy alliance to attack the people of the United States, let them come with their monkeys and their organ grinders; let them come with their hot tomales and chile con carne. [Laughter].

Let them come

* * * like sacrifices in their trim,
And to the fire-ey'd maid of snoky war,
All hot, and bleeding, will we offer them.

This Government is too powerful to deliberate under the threat of the armed powers of the earth. [Applause.] It has power enough to defend its citizens under all skies and on all the waters of the globe, and in its past history it has done so.

Premier Castellar also has complimented the President. He talks about the crazy Senate and people of the United States. He talks about the greatness and the glory of the President of the United States. I do not envy the President that man's compliment. His hands are besmeared with the blood of fifty-seven innocent American citizens who were executed while he was chief executive of Spain, murdered without trial. God grant that the day may come sometime when this great nation with all its power may once more be relieved from the shackles of the mercantile spirit of this country, when it may stand out in the face of the earth and assert and maintain the rights of its people everywhere, granting the rights of all other people honestly and religiously, observing them everywhere, and compelling every Government on the earth to respect the rights of its citizens.

on the earth to respect the rights of its citizens.

The President pays a high tribute to the national honor of Spain. I do not know at what period in her history his admiration begins. I do not know whether it begins when Torquemada was illuminating all the skies of southern Europe with the fires that burned to death those who opposed his views in religion and yet were loyal to the King of Spain. I do not know whether he refers to that period when the Duke of Alva was baptizing by immersion in blood the Netherlands and exterminating the whole population loyal to the King and loyal to his Government.

I do not know whether it was in that heroic age when Spain

I do not know whether it was in that heroic age when Spain first put her foot on Cuba's soil; when she found 3,000,000 of first put her foot on Cuba's soil; when she found 3,000,000 of her poor, simple-minded, kind, and inoffensive people, who received them with open arms, labored for them cheerfully, and with glad hearts ministered to all their wants. They erected the altars of Christianity and told them of the Nazarene who said they must love one another, visit the sick, clothe the naked, feed the hungry, and help the needy. They told them there was a time coming when the dead should rise again, and the good should ascend to heaven. The innocent and unsuspecting crowded around the altars of the Christians and joined them in mass. Before the Spaniard came they had an abiding faith that they would live again in another and a happier and fairer land than even beautiful Cuba. They rushed into the arms of the church and accepted that beautiful religion which the Spaniard preached. Soon the tiful Cuba. They rushed into the arms of the church and accepted that beautiful religion which the Spaniard preached. Soon the missionaries who had brought them the good tidings began to butcher them. They gathered them and hung them up and built fires under them and laughed when they writhed in contortions. They threw them over precipices, hundreds of feet high. They tore them limb from limb. They took women with their babes on their breasts, and the mothers falling over their little ones, yet them the Spaniard, pinioned each to the earth their breasts, and the mothers falling over their little ones, vainly struggling to save them, the Spaniard pinioned each to the earth with the same lance; and as the mothers died they cried with tears streaming down their cheeks, "We do not want to go to the heaven where the Christian goes." Is this the period in her history that attracts the wonder and admiration of the President?

Mr. President, I feel that the people of the United States are in honor bound to interfere for the deliverance of those people; that they are in honor bound to protect our own people on that island and to see that when they are in possession of their rights not a hair on their heads shall fall to the ground. Whether the Congress of the United States or the President shall go forward to the discharge of their high duty, so long as I remain in this body as a representative of the people of Texas I will speak their views in favor of the discharge of every obligation of this Government and in favor of rescuing those poor people from the dungeon into which we have committed them. [Applause in the galleries.]

PRESIDENT JACKSON'S MESSAGE IN RELATION TO TEXAS.

To the Senate of the United States:

PRESIDENT JACKSON'S MESSAGE IN RELATION TO TEXAS.

To the Senate of the United States:

During the last session information was given to Congress by the Executive that measures had been taken to ascertain "the political, military, and civil condition of Texas." I now submit for your consideration extracts from the report of the agent who had been appointed to collect it, relative to the condition of that country.

No steps have been taken by the Executive toward the acknowledgment of the independence of Texas, and the whole subject would have been left without further remark, on the information now given to Congress, were it not that the two Houses at their last session, acting separately, passed resolutions "that the independence of Texas ought to be acknowledged by the United States whenever satisfactory information should be received that it had in successful operation a civil government capable of performing the duties and fulfilling the obligations of an independent power." This mark of interest in the question of the independence of Texas and indication of the views of Congress make it proper that I should, somewhat in detail, present the considerations that have governed the Executive in continuing to occupy the ground previously taken in the contest between Mexico and Texas.

The acknowledgment of a new state as independent and entitled to a place in the family of nations is at all times an act of great delicacy and responsibility; but more especially so when such state has forcibly separated itself from another of which it had formed an integral part, and which still claims dominion over it. A premature recognition under these circumstances, if not looked upon as justifiable cause of war, is always liable to be regarded as a proof of an unfriendly spirit to one of the contending parties. All questions relative to the government of foreign nations, whether of the Old or New World, have been treated by the United States as questions of fact only, and our predecessors have cautiously abstained from decidi

MAY 25, 1864.—Referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JANUARY 11, 1897 .- Ordered to be reprinted.

To the House of Representatives

In answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives of yesterday on the subject of the joint resolution of the 4th of last month relative to Mexico, I transmit a report from the Secretary of State, to whom the resolution was referred. ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

WASHINGTON, May 24, 1864.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, May 24, 1864.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of yesterday, requesting the President to communicate to that House, "if not inconsistent with the public interest, any explanations given by the Government of the United States to the Government of France respecting the sense and bearing of the joint resolution relative to Mexico, which passed the House of Representatives unanimously on the 4th of April, 1864," has the honor to lay before the President a copy of all the correspondence on file or on record in this Department on the subject of the joint resolution referred to.

Respectfully submitted.

No. 525.] STR.

I send you a copy of a resolution which passed the House of Representatives on the 4th instant, by a unanimous vote, and which declares the opposition of that body to a recognition of a monarchy in Mexico. M. Geofrey has lost no time in asking for an explanation of this proceeding.

It is hardly necessary, after what I have heretofore written with perfect candor for the information of France, to say that this resolution truly interprets the unanimous sentiment of the people of the United States in regard to Mexico. It is, however, another and distinct question whether the United States would think it necessary or proper to express themselves in the form adopted by the House of Representatives at this time. This is a practical and purely executive question, and the decision of its constitutionality belongs not to the House of Representatives, nor even to Congress, but to the President of the United States. You will, of course, take notice that the declaration made by the House of Representatives is in the form of a joint resolution, which, before it can acquire the character of a legislative act, must receive, first, the concurrence of the Senate, and secondly, the approval of the President of the United States; or, in case of his dissent, the renewed assent of both Houses of Congress, to be expressed by a majority of two-thirds of each body. While the President receives the declaration of the House of Representatives with the profound respect to which it is entitled, as an exposition of its sentiments upon a grave and important subject, he directs that you inform the Government of France that he does not at present contemplate any departure from the policy which this Government has hitherto pursued in regard to the war which exists between France and Mexico. It is hardly necessary to say that the proceeding of the House of Representatives was adopted upon suggestions arising within itself, and not upon any communication of the executive department; and that the French Government would be seasonably apprised of SIR: I visited Mr. Drouyn de l'Huys yesterday at the department of foreign affairs. The first words he addressed to me on entering the room were: "Do you bring us peace, or bring us war?" I asked him to what he referred, and he said he referred more immediately to those resolutions recently passed by Congress in reference to the invasion of Mexico by the French, and the establishment of Maximilian upon the throne of that country. I said to him, in reply, that I did not think France had a right to infer that we were about to make war against her on account of anything contained in those resolutions; that they embodied nothing more than had been constantly held out to the French Government from the beginning; that I had always represented to the Government here that any action upon their part interfering with the form of government in Mexico would be looked upon with dissatisfaction in our country, and they could not expect us to be in haste to acknowledge a monarchial government, built upon the foundations of a republic which was our next neighbor; that I had reason to believe you had held the same language to the French minister in the United States. This allegation he did not seem to deny, but obviously viewed the resolutions in question as a serious step upon our part; and I am told that the leading secessionists here build largely upon these resolutions as a means of fomenting ill feeling between this country and some others and ourselves. Mr. Mason and his secretary have gone to Brussels to confer with Mr. Dudley Mann, who is their commissioner at that place. Mr. Slidell, it is said, was to have gone to Austria, although he has not yet got off.

PARIS, May 2, 1864.

SIR: Immediately upon the receipt of your dispatch No. 525, I applied to Mr. Drouyn de l'Huys for a special interview, which was granted for Saturday last. I then said that I knew that the French Government had felt some anxiety in respect to the resolution which had recently been passed by the House of Representatives in reference to Mexico, and inasmuch as I had just received a copy of that resolution, together with the views of the President of the United tates, I begged, if agreeable, to read to him your dispatch in reference to ——* latter. To this he assented, and as the shortest and most satisfactory mode, following out my instructions, I read to him that entire portion of your dispatch which applies to this subject, stating at the same time that I thought it was a remarkable illustration of the frankness and straightforwardness of the President. When the reading was closed, Mr. Drouyn de l'Huys expressed his gratification, and after asking some questions in regard to the effect of laying a resolution upon the table in the Senate, the conversation terminated.

The extreme sensitiveness which was manifested by this Government when the resolution of the House of Representatives was first brought to its knowledge has, to a considerable extent at least, subsided.

JOINT RESOLUTION ON MEXICAN AFFAIRS. JUNE 27, 1864.—Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

JANUARY 11, 1897.—Ordered to be reprinted.

JANUARY 11, 1897.—Ordered to be reprinted.

JANUARY 11, 1897.—Ordered to be reprinted.

Mr. Henry Winter Davis, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, made the following report:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs have examined the correspondence submitted by the President relative to the joint resolution on Mexican affairs with the profound respect to which it is entitled because of the gravity of its subject and the distinguished source from which it emanated.

They regret that the President should have so widely departed from the usage of constitutional governments as to make a pending resolution of so grave and delicate a character the subject of diplomatic explanations. They regret still more that the President should have thought proper to inform a foreign government of a radical and serious conflict of opinion and jurisdiction between the depositories of the legislative and executive power of the United States.

No expression of deference can make the denial of the right of Congress constitutionally to do what the House did with absolute unanimity other than derogatory to their dignity.

They learn with surprise that, in the opinion of the President, the form and term of expressing the judgment of the United States on recognizing a monarchical government imposed on a neighboring republic is a "purely executive question, and the decision of it constitutionally belongs, not to the House of Representatives, nor even to Congress, but to the President for the United States."

This assumption is equally novel and inadmissible. No President has ever claimed such an exclusive authority. No Congress can ever permit its expression to pass without dissent.

It is certain that the Constitution nowhere confers such authority on the President.

All questions of recognition, sufficiently numerous in this revolutionary era, do not countenance this view; and if there be one not inconsistent with it, the committee have not found it.

All questions of recognition have heretofore been debated and considered as grave questions

The correspondence now before us is the first attempt to depart from that usage and deny the nation a controlling deliberative voice in regulating its The following are the chief precedents on recognition of new governments and the policy of the United States Government on that topic:

"For an outift and one year's salary to such minister as the President, by the following clause:

That the House approves of the course aeretoforp purpover, and another. That the House approves of the course aeretoforp purpover, and another. That the House approves of the course aeretoforp purpover, and another. That the House approves of the course aeretoforp purpover, and another that the House approves of the course aeretoforp purpover, and another that the House approves of the course aeretoforp purpover, and another than the second purpover, and the second purpover, and

"Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill appropriating a sum not exceeding $100,000 to enable the President to give due effect to such recognition."

It is, therefore, equally apparent that the House of Representatives of the Seventeenth Congress was clearly of opinion with President Monroe that the question of recognition was not purely executive, but that it constitutionally belongs to Congress as well as to the President; that the legislature declares the will of the United States, which the Executive gives effect to, each concurring in the act of recognition according to their respective constitutional functions.

In obedience to that resolution the following bill recognizing the new the will of the United States, which the Executive gives effect to, each concurring in the act of recognition according to their respective constitutional functions.

In obedience to that resolution, the following bill, recognizing the new nation, was reported and passed, and approved on the 4th of May, 1822:

"That for such missions to the independent nations on the American continent as the President may deem proper, there be, and hereby is, appropriated a sum not exceeding $100,000, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

The approval of that law completed the recognition of the new nations. The sending ministers to some or all of them was matter of executive discretion, not at all essential to or connected with the fact of recognition. Ministers were appointed to Mexico, Colombia, Buenos Ayres, and Chile on the 27th of January, 1823. None was appointed to Peru till May, 1829; yet it is certain Peru was as much recognized by the United States as the other governments from the 4th of May, 1822.

This great precedent has governed all that follow it.

The acknowledgment of the independence of Texas stands next in our history. It is a most instructive precedent, strictly following the forms observed respecting the governments of Spanish America.

On the 18th of June, 1836, on the motion of Henry Clay, the Senate adopted the resolution—

"That the independence of Texas ought to be acknowledged by the United States whenever satisfactory information shall be received that it has in successful operation a civil government capable of performing the duties and fulfilling the obligations of an independent power."

The House of Representatives, on the 4th of July, 1836, adopted a resolution in the same words; and added a second:

"The thouse of Representatives, on the 4th of July, 1836, adopted a resolution in the same words; and added a second:

"The House of Representatives, on the 4th of July, 1836, adopted a resolution in the same words; and other president of the United States has and in that conferred on the Fresident to receive ministers from foreign nations."

"In the preamble to the resolution of the House of Representatives, it is distinctly intimated that the expediency of recognizing the independence of Texas should be left to the decision of Congress. In this view, on the ground of expediency, I am disposed to concur; and do not, therefore, think it necessary to express any opinion as to the strict constitutional right of the Executive, either apart from or in conjunction with the Senate, over the subject. It is to be presumed that on no future occasion will a dispute arise, as none has heretofore occurred, between the Executive and legislature in the exercise of the power of recognition. It will always be considered consistent with the spirit of the Constitution and most safe that it should be exercised, when probably leading to war, with a previous understanding with that body by whom war can alone be declared and by whom all the provisions for sustaining its perils must be furnished. Its submission to Congress, which represents in one of its branches the States of this Union and in the other the people of the United States, where there may be reasonable ground to apprehend so grave a consequence, would certainly afford the fullest satisfaction to our own country and a perfect guarantee to all other countries of the justice and prudence of the measures which ought to be adopted."

After forcibly stating why he thought "we should still stand aloof," he leaded with the "Allowing declaration".

satisfaction to our own country and a perfect guarantee to all other countries of the justice and prudence of the measures which ought to be adopted."

After forcibly stating why he thought "we should still stand aloof," he closed with the following declaration:

"Having thus discharged my duty, by presenting with simplicity and directness the views which, after much reflection, I have been led to take of this important subject, I have only to add the expression of my confidence that if Congress should differ with me upon it, their judgment will be the result of dispassionate, prudent, and wise deliberation; with the assurance that during the short time which I shall continue connected with the Government I shall promptly and cordially unite with you in such measures as may be deemed best fitted to increase the prosperity and perpetuate the peace of our favored country."

The concurrent resolutions of the Senate and House of Representatives and that message of President Jackson leave no doubt that the views which presided over the recognition of the South American governments still prevailed, and that the President was as far from asserting as Congress from admitting that the recognition of new nations and the foreign policy of the United States is a purely executive question.

The independence of Texas was finally recognized in pursuance of the following enactment in the appropriation bill of the second session of the Twenty-fourth Congress, which appropriated money—

"For the outfit and salary of a diplomatic agent to be sent to the Republic of Texas, whenever the President of the United States may receive satisfactory evidence that Texas is an independent power, and shall deem it expedient to appoint such minister." (5 Statutes, 170.)

That law was approved by President Jackson.

Not only is this exclusive assumption without countenance in the early history of the Republic, but it is irreconcilable with the most solemn acts of the present Administration. The independence of Haiti is nearly as old as that of

That was a formal recognition of those republics by law, whether the President sent diplomatic representatives or not.

Quite in the spirit of these precedents is the well-considered language of the "Those questions which respect the rights of a part of a foreign emptre which asserts and is contending for its independence, belong more properly to those who can declare what the law shall be, who can place the nation in such a position with respect to foreign powers as to their own judgment shall appear wise, to whom are intrusted its foreign relations, than to that tribunal whose power as well as duty is confined to the application of the rule which the legislature may prescribe for it."

But the joint resolution of the 4th of April does more than declare the refusal of the United States to recognize a monarchical usurpation in Mexico. It declares a general rule of policy, which can be anthentically and authoritatively expressed only by the body charged with the legislative power of the United States.

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress of the United States are unwilling, by silence, to leave the nations of the world under the impression that they are indifferent spectators of the deplorable events now transpiring in the Republic of Mexico; and they therefore think fit to declare that it does not accord with the policy of the United States to acknowledge a monarchical government erected on the ruins of any republican government in America, under the auspices of any European power."

The committee are of opinion that this authority to speak in the name of the United States to acknowledge a monarchical government erected on the ruins of any republican government in America, under the auspices of any European power, it is president Monroe's declaration of this kind in our history, which events seem now likely to make of as grave practical interest as whe tions I made during my conference with the Mexican plenipotentiaries, I alluded only to the message of the President of the United States to Congress in 1823.

"That message, declared, in my opinion, by the soundest policy, has been regarded both in Europe and America as a solemn declaration of the views and intentions of the Executive of the United States, and I have always considered that declaration as a pledge, so far as the language of the President can pledge the nation, to defend the new American Republics from the attacks of any of the powers of Europe other than Spain. That the people of the United States are not bound by any declarations of the Executive is known and understood as well in Mexico, where the Government is modeled on our own political institutions, as in the United States themselves. But in order to correct any erroneous impressions these words might have made on the minds of the Mexican plenipotentiaries, I explained to them in the course of our conference this morning their precise meaning: That the declaration of Mr. Monroe in his message of 1823, to which I had alluded, indicated only the course of policy the Executive of the United States was disposed to pursue toward these countries, but was not binding on the nation unless sanctioned by the Congress of the United States; and when I spoke of the United States having pledged themselves not to permit any other power than Spain to interfere with the independence or form of government of the American Republics, I meant only to allude to the above-cited declaration of the President of the United States in his message of 1823, and to nothing more."

This explanation is the more significant from the fact that Mr. Clay's instructions to Mr. Poinsett directed him to bring to the notice of the Mexican Government the message of the late President of the United States to their Congress on the 2d of December, 1823, asserting certain important principles of intercontinental law in the relations of Europe and America; and, after stating and enlar entirely to coincide in both, and you will urge upon the covernment of a salico the propriety and expediency of asserting the same principles on all proper occasions."

And in reply to the resolution of inquiry of the 27th of March, Mr. Clay accompanied his instructions with the declaration—entirely in the spirit of Mr. Poinsett's letter—"that the United States have contracted no engagement nor made any pledge to the Governments of Mexico and South America, or either of them, that the United States would not permit the interference of any foreign power with the independence or form of government of those nations. * * *

"If, indeed, an attempt by force had been made by allied Europe to subvert the liberties of the southern nations on this continent, and to erect upon the ruins of their free institutions monarchical systems, the people of the United States would have stood pledged, in the opinion of the Executive, not to any foreign state, but to themselves and their posterity, by their dearest interests and highest duties, to resist to the utmost such attempt; and it is to a pledge of that character that Mr. Poinsett above refers."—Congressional Debates, Nineteenth Congress, first session, Appendix, 33, 84.

Such were the views of the Administration of President John Quincy Adams, whose Secretary of State was Henry Clay, and whose minister to Mexico was Mr. Poinsett, upon the supremacy of the Legislature in declaring the foreign policy of the United States, the diplomatic execution and conduct of which is confided to the President.

It is impossible to condense the elaborate message of President Adams of the 15th of March, 1826, dedicated to persuading Congress to concur in and sanction the Panama mission; but that message and the great debate which consumed the session in both Houses are unmeaning on the assumptions of approval of its recommendation and approval of its recommendation of the object of the united States are expected to take part in the deliberations of that consideration of President Monroe above quoted, and on that topic said:

"Among other subjects of deliberation, the President mount and the property of the

But this correspondence requires us to say, that in view of the historic precedents, it is not a purely executive question whether the United States would think it necessary to express themselves in the form adopted by the House of Representatives at this time; it does belong to Congress to declare and decide on the foreign policy of the United States, and it is the daily of the President to first to that policy by means of diplomatic negotiations, or The President is not less bound to execute the national will expressed by law in its foreign than in its domestic concerns.

The President appoints all officers of the United States, but their duties are regulated, not by his not were to his it except when the law points out the occasion and the object. He appoints foreign ministers, but neither in this case are they, by reason of their appointment, anything but the ministers of the law. If it be true that the appointment of an ambassador to a nation implies the recognition of that athat does not exist by the recognition of Congress as that the President can recognize alone because he can appoint. But we prefer to waive the question. We are anxious not to depart from the approved precedents of our history. Our desire is to preserve, not to change. We will not furite excession will a dispute arise, as none has heretolore occurred, between the Executive and legislature in the exercise of the presumed that on no future excasion will a dispute arise, as none has heretolore occurred, between the Executive and legislature in the exercise of the power of the presumed that on no future excasion will a dispute arise, as none has heretolore occurred, between the Executive and legislature in the exercise of the power whose present and important occasions by and in pursuance of law in the particular cases.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not propose now to take up much of the time of the Senate in debating either the joint resolution or the subject-matter. It is simply to-day a most court procedure. No vote can be taken upon the joint resolution, and under the rules it will go either to the Committee on Foreign Relations or to the Calendar for future action by the Senate, if it choose such action hereafter. The whole subject-matter is presented in the resolutions submitted by the Committee on Foreign Relations, which now rest on the Calendar of the Senate, and it is presumable that at some day near or distant the committee will seek to take them up, which will open the whole subject-matter.

At that time this question will be debated in full. Every phase of this great, most important, critical question before the American people will then be discussed.

Eloquent as has been the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLs], who is undoubtedly in favor of extremities to the point of war, I shall not seek to answer him now, but will leave that to the real debate when the real question is before the body.

I will not, however, let the opportunity go without amplifying somewhat upon the citation that he has given of the action of this Government in the case of Texas, upon the technical point as to where lies the power of recognition. The Senator has cited the action of President Jackson and the Congress of the United States as fortifying his contention. If there is any case in the history of this Government which clearly and plainly and overwhelmingly maintains the other side, that the power rests with the Executive, it is the Texas incident. I do not think the subject is bounded by that question. I do not think that is the chief part of the subject which is before us. I can understand that if I agreed with the Senator from Texas as to the question where the power of recognition lies I might then, unlike him, believe that the time had not muon les I might then, unlike him, believe that the time had not come for recognition; and when this question shall be launched upon general debate it will not be confined to the issue whether the Executive or Congress has lodged in it the power of recognizing a government of a foreign people, but the greater question, whether in the domain of wisdom and patriotism and careful action the time has come for such recognition. All that will be fully presented when the real debate opens, but I shall not attempt it now.

I have the authorities on the Texas case however and as the

I have the authorities on the Texas case, however, and as the Senator from Texas has cited the instance of his own State with so much confidence, I will in a very few moments give them to the Senate. The Senator cited the Walker resolution. I have here the original record of the Senate. January 12, 1837, Mr. Walker, of Mississippi, submitted the following resolution:

That the State of Texas having established and maintained an independent government-

And so forth, as the Senator read it-that the independent political existence of said State be acknowledged by the Government of the United States.

I call attention in passing to this, which will be found true of every resolution, so far as I have searched the records, submitted upon the question of recognition by either House of Congress, that, unlike the resolution of the Senator from Texas or the resolutions of the Committee on Foreign Relations, it does not of itself recognize, and none of them recognize, the Government, but declare, as in this case, "that the independent political existence of said State should be acknowledged by the Government of the United States." This resolution on February 10, 1837, as appears on page 286 of the records of the Senate of that day—the Senate Journal-was laid on the table.

On February 13—Senators will bear in mind that the session was waning, that the Congress was expiring—Mr. Walker again attempted to bring up the resolution before the Senate. By a vote of 32 to 12, found on page 244 of the Senate Journal, he was defeated, and the Senate refused to consider the resolution.

On February 27, found on page 292, he again made the motion and was defeated, and the resolution was postponed, although at so late a day as February 27, five days before the death of the Congress had been reached.

On March 1 it was passed by a vote of 23 to 19, as found on page 310, and on March 2, the day after this vote, the final vote was taken on reconsideration, and the resolution barely escaped defeat taken on reconsideration, and the resolution parely escaped decrease by a vote of 24 to 24, page 318. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to some of the Senators who are found voting at that time. On the motion to reconsider the vote adopting the Senate resolution the vote was 24 to 24, and the motion failed. Among those who voted in the affirmative to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted are found Mr. Buchanan, afterwards President, who, two days before the expiration of Congress, was not willing to vote either that the time for recognition had come or whing to vote either that the time for recognition had come or that any power rested in the Senate to so recognize; Mr. Clayton, who afterwards became Secretary of State; Mr. Ewing, of Ohio; Mr. King, of Alabama, afterwards Vice-President; Mr. Page, Mr. Prentiss, Mr. Southard, Mr. Swift, Mr. Tallmadge, Mr. Wall, Mr. Webster, Mr. Wright—Silas Wright.

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator from Maine kindly give the volume and page from which he is reading?

Mr. HALE. I am reading from the Journal of the Senate, second session of the Twenty-fourth Congress, the vote being found on page 318.

Mr. President, upon almost the expiring day of that Congress it was only upon a tie vote that a Senate resolution, not in itself claiming to recognize Texas as an independent government, but only advisory, was barely saved from defeat, and after that nothing further was done. If the Senator from Texas can gain any strength in this point of law from that record, he is certainly welcome to it.

But it is greatly surpassed by the House record. I have here the Journal of the House of Representatives of the second session of the Twenty-fourth Congress, and I find that on page 492 Mr. Howard submitted not a joint resolution, only an expression from the House:

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States, That the independence of the government of Texas ought to be recognized.

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to provide, in the bill for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government, a salary and outfit for such public agent as the President may determine to send to Texas.

Upon which Mr. Ingersoll moved to lay the resolution on the table. This was as late as February 21, twelve days before the closing of the Congress. On page 492, February 21, the vote is taken and recorded upon the resolution, and it was laid on the table by a vote of 98 to 86.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Maine permit me to ask whether he considers that vote as an expression upon the constitutional power of Congress or upon the policy of the action pro-

Mr. HALE. Upon both.
Mr. BACON. Why?
Mr. HALE. Upon both, as the Senator will see when I come to the final action.

On February 28, then within four days of the close of the session, on February 28, then within four days of the close of the session, an amendment to the diplomatic appropriation bill was offered by Mr. Thompson providing for a diplomatic representative to the Republic of Texas. It is found on pages 546 and 547 of the House Journal, which I commend for perusal and study to the Senator from Texas, as well as the report on page 268 of the House proceedings of March 2 or 3, 1887, to which I will immediately refer. The amendment of Mr. Thompson was amended by the addition of the following words:

Whenever the President of the United States may receive satisfactory evidence that Texas is an independent power and shall deem it expedient to appoint such minister.

I do not know how it will be possible for Congress in acting upon this subject-matter to more definitely recognize the power and admit it to be in the President than in the language of the final action of the House, the only way in which it could be passed. As the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] suggests to me, they did not prescribe facts or conditions, but declared in terms that it should only be when the President himself should have decided in his executive function that the time had come. That was why I asked the Senator from Texas when he was re-ferring to this matter what condition was finally added by the House; and no answer was given until I read it here. It is most distinct and clear.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will recognize that even though the mover of the resolution, and even though Congress might maintain the ultimate power of Congress, he and it might still be willing to allow the executive department to determine when the particular state of facts would authorize the exercise of that

power

Mr. HALE. It is interesting, Mr. President, when we take this Texas incident and see upon which side it is an authority, to look at the debate in the House, which is found on page 268 of the Congressional Globe, of the second session of the Twenty-fourth Congress, in 1837, where Mr. Thompson's proposition for a diplomatic agent to Texas was so modified as to clearly recognize the whole power as to when recognition should be granted as lying with the President.

I quote from the Congressional Globe of the proceedings of March 3, 1837, page 268, as follows:

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATIONS.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATIONS.

The House then took up the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1837, the amendment providing outfits and salaries for ministers to Prussia and Austria being taken up separately.

Mr. Mercer inquired of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means if the President had recommended a mission to Austria. That to Prussia he [Mr. Mercer] had no objection to.

Mr. Howard (chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs) said that he could answer the question probably better than the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and would doso. The proposition emanated from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and was adopted by them to aid, as far as they could, the views of the select committee of the House, who had made a report as to the best mode of increasing the consumption of tobacco in foreign countries, and particularly Germany. He believed that the gentleman from Virginia represented in part a tobacco interest, or at least he must feel anxious for its prosperity. After the Committee on Foreign Affairs had decided on the propriety of the measure, he (Mr. H.) had inquired at the Department of State if there existed any reasons why the plan should not be carried out, and was informed that on the contrary our Government was at the present time engaged in the discussion of a delicate question with both Austria and Prussia, arising out of treaties which we had with those powers. What this question was it is not now necessary to state. Mr. H.'s only object was to say that although the proposed measure met with the concurrence of the Executive, he (Mr. H.) wished the responsibility of it to rest upon the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. Thompson, of South Carolina, then moved to amend the amendment by providing for the outilt and salary of a diplomatic agent, to be sent to the independent Republic of Texas.

Mr. Griffin called for the yeas and nays on this amendment, which were ordered.

Mr. Cushing said this question lay

Mr. Grimn called for the yeas and nays on this amendment, which were ordered.

Mr. Cushing said this question lay within the compass of a nutshell as a diplomatic question. He admitted and asserted the right of recognition on our part in all cases, but he insisted that the time of recognition was a question of discretion, to be exercised according to our own convictions of our own interest. In the present case, in Mr. C.'s judgment, the time had not arrived, and therefore he should vote against the amendment.

Mr. Adams objected to the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina for the further reason—ing the responsibility from the hands of the Executive, where it properly belonged.

ing the responsibility from the hands of the Executive, where it properly belonged.

After some remarks by Messrs. Jenifer, Mercer, Pickens, Hamer, Chilton Allan, and William B. Shepard.

The last gentleman suggested the following modification:

"Whenever the President of the United States may receive satisfactory evidence that Texas is an independent power, and shall deem it expedient to appoint such minister."

Mr. Thompson accepted this as a modification.

After some remarks by Mr. White of Kentucky,

Mr. Cambreleng remarked that the phraseology of the amendment involved an incongruity as it was now modified, inasmuch as the first branch set forth that "Texas" was an "independent Republic," and the second left the "evidence" of that fact to the "satisfaction" of the President, and limiting his sending the agent to that fact.

Mr. Mercer moved to strike out the words "the independent Republic."

The Chair ruled the motion to be out of order.

Mr. Thompson would compromise the difference between gentlemen and modify the amendment by striking out the word "independent."

After some conversation between Messrs. Hoar, Thompson, and Cambreleng, the question was taken on the amendment of Mr. Thompson as modified, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 121, nays 76.

So the amendment to the amendment of the Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The amendment of the Committee of the Whole as amended was concurred in; and the whole appropriation was increased to meet the change involved in the amendment.

There would have been no action of the House of Representa-tives, there would have been no action in the direction of recognition, except that the mover of the amendment upon the diplomatic appropriation bill accepted the amendment which declared in terms the powers of the President. The whole force of the Texas incident is in favor of the Executive prerogative. He who examines the record thoroughly will find this to be the history.

examines the record thoroughly will find this to be the history.

Mr. President, I am not going to amplify the point; but in no case can any precedent be found where Congress—as is attempted in this Congress at the present session—has undertaken to absorb and assume the power of recognition. There are cases where the President has conferred with Congress, has submitted questions to Congress for its advice; there are cases where Congress has passed what may be called advisory resolutions; but there are no cases where Congress has sought to clutch or has clutched the power of recognition and taken it away from the Executive.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine a question.

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Certainly,
Mr. ALLEN. Does he contend that the power to recognize either belligerency or independence is a power which resides exclusively in the executive department, and with which the legislative department has nothing to do?
Mr. HALE. I believe that it does, Mr. President. I believe that after trying in the Continental Congress the experiment of conducting diplomacy and negotiations by a body legislative in its nature, the fathers of the Constitution were so wearied with that experiment that they lodged the power with the Executive, and intended to maintain it there. The only question that was ever raised when the State Department was created by law was that it took too much from that power of the President which had been lodged with him by the Constitution.
Mr. ALLEN. Then I should like to ask the Senator a further question. If the power to recognize belligerency or independence is exclusive in the Executive, and the Executive is entirely independent of the legislative in that respect, the power to recognize carries with it then the implied power to terminate the recognition at the discretion or caprice of the Executive. Is not that tion at the discretion or caprice of the Executive. Is not that

Mr. HALE. Oh, it does not follow. After a government has been recognized it has a status not only with the nations of the world, but with this country. Neither do I claim that in all the incidentals the Executive is independent of Congress. Most of incidentals the Executive is independent of Congress. Most of this controversy has come up because the Executive is not independent of Congress in the incidentals. He can not carry out recognition, he can pay no accredited agent, he can not put the machinery afloat, he can not move an inch, unless Congress appropriates money. The underlying reason that will be found in almost all the cases which have been cited by the Senator from Texas or by others upon that side, where any action of Congress has been taken, is in the fact that in the incidentals the Executive is not independent, but goes to Congress for the money that is needed to carry out his policy. But that the initial act, the recognition of a state, was intended to be lodged with the Executive, I, from my examination and research, can have no doubt whatever.

or a state, was intended to be lodged with the Executive, I, from my examination and research, can have no doubt whatever.

Mr. ALLEN. I suppose the Senator from Maine does not doubt that the establishment of commercial relations by Congress with the Republic of Cuba would be of itself a recognition of Cuban independence, or at least of Cuban autonomy. That is, the establishment of commercial relations would be one of the means of interest. In the present case, in Mr. C.'s judgment, the time had not arrived, and therefore he should vote against the amendment.

Mr. Adams objected to the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina for the further reason—

I call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to this—that the President had not recommended the recognition of the independence of Texas to Congress, and Mr. A. was not disposed to set the example of tak-mistaken) that the establishment of commercial relations with a nation or people is itself recognition of the political existence of those people.

those people.

Mr. HALE. I do not think the report has gone so far, but I do not take direct issue on the point as to whether a statute of that kind might be a practical recognition. But that is only incidental. No one can claim that any act of Congress approved by a President or passed over his veto regulating the commerce of a nation or touching the neutrality laws is of itself a primal act for the purpose of recognition. We do not deal with foreign nations in that way. We deal directly with them by something that is clear and explicit and either does or does not recognize.

Mr. ALLEN. Suppose Congress should pass a law declaring that commercial relations should be established with the Republic of Cuba; that the Executive in his wisdom would veto that act, but we would pass it by the constitutional majority essential to pass a measure over the President's veto, and that law were in force now, would not that of itself be a complete recognition of the independence and the political autonomy of the Cuban Republic?

Mr. HALE. I do not answer that question, because I am by no means certain; but I repeat that we do not go here to the question of recognition in that indirect way. It is not sought so here. It is sought by direct and explicit resolution, having the force of law, to declare that Congress is the Government and, as the Government recognizes Cales.

ernment, recognizes Caba.

Mr. ALLEN. In that connection, if the Senator will permit

Mr. HALE. And, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr.

Hoar] suggests to me, without exercising any Congressional power that may be incident to the subject.

Mr. ALLEN. I think the Senator will find that there is little doubt of the fact that that would be a recognition of the independence of Cuba. That being true, and Congress being invested with the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, it carries with it the power to establish, for that is one of the means of regulating. Therefore, is not the power through that provision of the Constitution exclusive in Congress to recognize the independence of Cuba, or a people struggling for their liberty?

Mr. HALE. I do not agree with the Senator, but I do not wish

Mr. HALE. I do not agree with the Senator, but I do not wish to go into that discussion now, as I told the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. Pettigrew] that I would not consume much time.

Mr. WHITE. If the Senator from Maine will excuse me, I wish simply to make one remark. It was suggested by the question of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Allen] regarding the power of the President to revoke recognition. It was settled, I think, by almost all the writers on international law, at all events, howsever it may be regarding our municipal laws, that a recognition.

howsoever it may be regarding our municipal laws, that a recognition once given can not be revoked.

Mr. HALE. This whole subject-matter at my request has been gone over very carefully in an elaborate discussion of the subject, which I intend at some future time to use and quote from. It was prepared for me, and rather than quote from it now and read from it I ask that it may be printed in the Record as part of my remarks.

part of my remarks.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine one

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator from Maine allow the paper presented by him to be printed as a document also?
Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. HALE. Yes, Mr. HOAR. I will wait until the Senator's request for printing be acted on.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the printing in the RECORD of the paper referred to by the Senator from Maine?

The Chair hears none.

Mr. HALE. Let it be printed as a document also.

Memorandum upon Power to Recognize Independence of a New Foreign State.

STATEMENT OF QUESTION.

The present question arises mainly upon the two following proposed joint resolutions:

1. That the independence of the Republic of Cuba be, and the same is hereby, acknowledged by the United States of America.

2. That the United States will use its friendly offices with the Government of Spain to bring to a close the war between Spain and the Republic of Cuba.

and the Republic of Cuba.

First resolution: It will be noticed that this resolution is not an act of legislation. It does not purport to direct any course of action for the future. It is simply a finding of fact.

Regarded as the finding of a present fact, this obviously sugaction for the future.

gests two comments:

that of the Island of Cuba, and the part of that island which it does not possess is the most valuable and populous part of the island. This raises some doubt as to whether the intent of the resolution really is to acknowledge a present state of independence as distinguished from a hope of early future independence; for if the former be the true construction of the first resolution, the second resolution would imply a desire for an immediate settlement of the present conflict between Spain and the "Republic of Cuba" as now independent—or, in other words, a peace which would leave Habana, Matanzas, Cienfuegos, and the other most valuable portions of the island in the hands of Spain. If the resolution be intended to declare, not the existence of a present fact, lution be intended to declare, not the existence of a present fact, valuable portions of the island in the hands of Spain. If the resolution be intended to declare, not the existence of a present fact, but a hope for the immediate accomplishment of a desired result, then there can be no question of power between the legislative and the executive branches of the Government. The expression of a hope is neither a legislative nor an executive act. It is a privilege which the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of the Government all equally enjoy and occasionally make use of.

Second, that the adoption of such a resolution, whichever construction is put upon it, will be of no direct advantage to the insurgents in Cuba. It will cause no abatement in the enforcement of the neutrality laws. These laws were, indeed, originally drawn for application to wars between two powers whose independence had been recognized. Their application to insurrections like the present was the result of amendments made at the instance of President Monroe in 1818. Nor would the obligations of this Government to the Kingdom of Spain be any less urgent if the independence of the Cuban insurgents were recognized. It will be shown, both by the terms of the Constitution itself and by the uniform practice thereunder, that the recognition of independence of a new foreign power is an act of the executive (President alone, or President and Senate) and not of the legislative branch of the Government, although the executive branch may properly first consult the legislative.

While the legislative branch of the Government can not directly exercise the power of recognizing a foreign government, because that is a power executive or indical in nature (and one which the exercise the power of recognizing a foreign government, because that is a power executive or judicial in nature (and one which the judiciary, by refusing independently to examine the question, cast entirely upon the executive), nevertheless, if a recognition of such independence is liable to become a casus belli with some other foreign power, it will be shown that it is most advisable, as well as proper, for the executive first to consult the legislative branch as to its wishes, and postpone its own action if not assured of legislative approval. If, on the other hand, the Executive did not consider that the time had arrived to act, expressions of opinion by the Legislature should be made with some caution, as an expression of its opinion in too positive a form might create such international complications as to make effective action on behalf of the nation seeking recognition more difficult.

It is also to be noticed that while the legislative branch of the Government is not charged with the duty of ascertaining whether or not an insurrection in a foreign country has reached the stage or not an insurrection in a foreign country has reached the stage of independence in fact, nevertheless it has the power and may recognize a duty to assist the insurrectionists. In other words, the power of Congress, either with the President's approval or with the concurrence of two-thirds of both Houses in case of the President's veto, to help the present Cuban insurgents by legislative action is not disputed. It may be exercised by declaring war against Spanish commerce; by suspending the operation of the neutrality laws; by enacting that the neutrality laws shall not apply to expeditions in aid of the insurgents, or by making any desired changes in our present legislation which may be desired by the "Republic of Cuba" or its supporters. These actions will be violations of international law, but no more so than a recognition of independence of the "Republic of Cuba" at the present tion of independence of the "Republic of Cuba" at the present juncture. Any one of them would be a casus belli, but none except the first two would necessarily result in a declaration of war by Spain.

Second resolution. The extension of "friendly offices" is a purely diplomatic act, and, as will be shown, one not only confided to the Executive, but almost impossible of practical effect if attempted by the legislative branch of the Government.

The following propositions can be clearly established:

NEITHER THE LEGISLATIVE NOR THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH OF THE GOVERN-MENT IS SUBORDINATE TO THE OTHER. THEY WERE INTENDED TO BE AND ARE COORDINATE

This has been from the beginning so familiar and elementary a doctrine of our constitutional law that it would not have been mentioned here if it had not been recently by some disputed.

The distinction between the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the Government is as old as Aristotle (quoted gests two comments:

First, that the word "Cuba" is used in a novel and restrictive sense. The "Republic of Cuba" is not coextensive with the Island of Cuba. Assuming the Republic to be a settled and independent Government, republican in form, its territory is less than States. Mr. Bancroft, quoted in Foster's work, supra, points out that Montesquieu's Spirit of the Laws was in constant use in debates on the Constitution, as well as by the authors of the Federalist, and that an abstract made by Madison had been studied and copied with his own hand by Washington when preparing for the convention. Mr. Foster quotes Montesquieu's remarks as to this threefold division of the powers of government. He says:

By the first, the prince or magistrate makes the laws, * * * and changes or repeals those which have been made. By the second, he makes peace or war, sends or receives ambassadors, establishes security, prevents invasions. By the third, he punishes crimes or judges the disputes of individuals. This latter is called the power of judging and the previous one simply the executive power of the state, etc.

Montesquieu proceeds to say that "when in the same person or the same body of magistrates the legislative power is joined with the executive power there is no liberty." No law book was more familiar in 1787 than Mr. Justice Blackstone's Commentaries, then recently issued. His adoption of Montesquieu's reasoning is pointed out in 1 Story on the Constitution, section 522.

The Constitution assumes, without expressly saying, that the three powers shall be independent and coordinate. Article I commences with the words "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress." Article II commences with the words "The executive power shall be vested in a President." Article III begins with the words "The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts," etc. The same fundamental division of powers is even more clearly recognized in many of the State constitutions of that time and since. Thus, in the constitution of Massachusetts it is declared that "in the government of this Commonwealth the legislative department shall never exercise the executive and judicial powers, or either of them; the judicial shall never exercise the legislative and succutive powers, or either of them, to the end that there may be a government of the property of them." (Constitution of 1750 Bill of them). tive powers, or either of them, to the end that there may be a government of laws, and not of men." (Constitution of 1780, Bill of Rights, Article XXX, quoted in 1 Story on the Constitution, section 520.) Mr. Justice Story says (1 Story on the Constitution, section 524):

And it is no small commendation of the Constitution of the United States that, instead of adopting a new theory, it has placed this practical truth as the basis of its organization. It has placed the legislative, executive, and judicial powers in different hands.

Mr. Justice Story then proceeds to point out the care with which the framers of the Constitution had provided for the exceptions to this general subdivision of powers in order the better to preserve the balance of the whole. He points out the natural tendency of the legislative power, through its control of the appropriations and otherwise, to become supreme, but treats this, not as a tend-and otherwise, to become supreme, but treats this, not as a tend-ency which should result in absorbing the others, but as one which was to be checked as far as possible.

The first commentator on the Constitution was Mr. Justice Wilson, of the Supreme Court, who had in the constitutional con-vention of 1787, according to Curtis, ranked only next to Madison and Hamilton in influence. He says (1 Wilson's Works, pages 407, 409, 410):

Though the foregoing great powers—legislative, executive, and judicial—are all necessary to a good government, yet it is of the last importance that each of them be preserved distinct and unmingled in the exercise of its separate powers with either or with both of the others. * * * Let us suppose the legislative and executive powers united in the same person. Can liberty or security be expected? No. * * But further, each of the great powers of government should be independent as well as distinct. When we say this it is necessary—since the subject is of primary consequence in the science of government—that our meaning be fully understood and accurately defined, for this position, like every other, has its limitations, and it is important to ascertain them.

The independency of each power consists in this, that its proceedings and the motives, views, and principles which produce those proceedings should be free from the remotest influence, direct or indirect, of either of the other two powers. But further than this the independency of each power cought not to extend. * * *

We are now led to discover that between these three great powers of government there ought to be a mutual dependency as well as a mutual independency. We have described their independency; let us now describe their dependency. It consists in this, that the proceedings of each, when they come forth into action and are ready to affect the whole, are liable to be examined and controlled by one or both of the others.

The most familiar recent statement of this principle is by Mr. Justice Miller in Kilbourn vs. Thompson (103 U.S., 168, 190-191), quoted in 1 Foster on the Constitution, page 297. Mr. Foster also quotes the following words of Chief Justice Waite in the Sinking Fund Cases (99 U.S., 700, 718), repeated by Mr. Justice Harlan in Clough vs. Curtis (134 U.S., 361, 371):

One branch of the Government can not encroach on the domain of another without danger.

In re Tyler (149 U.S., 164), Chief Justice Fuller said:

The maintenance of the system of checks and balances, characteristic of a republican constitution, requires the coordinate departments of Government, whether Federal or State, to refrain from any infringement of the independence of each other.

An examination either of Congressional debates or of executive documents from the beginning of the Government will show the great care with which each of these departments has endeavored, with rare exceptions, not to infringe upon the province of the other; and in no instance is this more clearly shown than in the other; and in no instance is this more clearly shown than in the debates upon the power to recognize a new foreign government—Congress on the one hand (except one House in 1869) confining its action to proffers of advice or assistance, while the President, on the other hand, when any international complication from such recognition seemed probable, so that recognition would involve contingencies requiring legislation, would ascertain the wishes of the legislative branch of the Government.

IF ANY GIVEN POWER BELONGS TO THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH OF THE GOV-ERNMENT, PRESUMPTIVELY IT DOES NOT BELONG TO THE LEGISLATIVE BRANCH.

It is clear all through the Constitution, and has never been disputed, that the intention was to distribute the powers of the Government between its three branches, subject to such checks as the veto of the President or advice and consent of the Senate, and not to place any given power in two or all three branches of the Government concurrently.

The existence of the same power for the same purposes in both the legislative and executive branches of the Government might lead to most unfortuned assemble.

lead to most unfortunate results. For instance, if the legislative and executive branches both possessed the power of recognizing the independence of a foreign nation, and one branch should declare it independent, while the other denied its independence, then, since they are coordinate, how could the problem be solved by the judicial branch?

The distinction must be borne in mind between the existence of a constitutional power and the existence of an ability to effect certain results.

For instance, Congress alone has the power to declare war. The Executive, however, can do many acts which would constitute a casus belli, and thus indirectly result in war; but this does not imply in the Executive a concurrent power to declare war, and the war which would result would be one declared by a foreign power. It is possible, even, that the judiciary, by declaring some act of Congress at an inopportune moment to be unconstitutional, or otherwise incapable of execution according to its intent, or by or otherwise incapable of execution according to its intent, or by some decision in a prize cause or otherwise, could give rise to a war with a foreign power; yet no one would claim that the judiciary had the power to declare war.

Going yet further, even, a State of the Union, although having admittedly no power whatever in foreign relations, may take action, uncontrollable by the Federal Government, and which, if not properly a casus belli, might nevertheless as a practical matter afford to some foreign country the excuse for a declaration of ter afford to some foreign country the excuse for a declaration of war. We may instance the action which might have been taken by the State of Wyoming in relation to the Chinese massacres, or the State of Louisiana in relation to the Italian lynchings; or by the State of New York in its recent controversy with German insurance companies with relation to the treatment of its own insurance companies by Germany.

III.

WHEREVER AFFIRMATIVE ACTION OF EITHER THE EXECUTIVE OR THE LEGISLATIVE BRANCH OF THE GOVERNMENT MAY INVOLVE A CALL UPON THE ASSISTANCE OF THE OTHER, THE BRANCH ABOUT TO TAKE ACTION SHOULD, IF POSSIBLE, FIRST OBTAIN INDICATIONS OF THE OTHER'S DESIRES.

It is of the highest importance that these two independent and coordinate branches of the Government should be always in accord, and that neither should endeavor to force action of the accord, and that neither should endeavor to force action of the other by indirect means. For this reason Monroe consulted Congress before recognizing the independence of the South American Republics in 1822, and Jackson similarly consulted Congress before recognizing the independence of Texas in 1837; while, on the other hand, when recognition of the independence of a new country is not a probable casus belli, the President always acts without a consultation even when Congress is in session, as has recently been done in the case of the great Republic of Central America.

EITHER BRANCH MAY PROPERLY EXPRESS ITS OPINION OR WISHES TO THE OTHER.

This was at first to some degree questioned, but has been a longsettled practice.

The Executive, indeed, is expressly directed by the Constitution to recommend legislation to Congress:

He shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient. (Constitution, Article II, section 3.)

It has always been customary for the President to indicate to Congress his views of the constitutionality of proposed measures; and with eminent propriety, since the time of Congress should not be taken up with the consideration of measures which the President is secretly intending to veto. The relations between them dent is secretly intending to veto. should be full and frank.

On the other hand, either House of Congress may, and sometimes does, by resolution express its wishes for certain Executive action or its willingness to effectuate such action by legislation; and occasionally both Houses have joined in such an expression by a concurrent resolution. Such resolutions are to be adopted with some caution when they affect the foreign relations of the Government, because they may unwittingly be passed at inopportune moments, and thus jeopardize negotiations of which Congress is necessarily ignorant, and tend to defer rather than to hasten the accomplishment of objects which both branches of the Government equally desire. Thus President Monroe and his Cabinet, who were anxious both for the independence of the South American republics and the aggrandizement of our own territory by the acquisition of Florida and confirmation of title to Oregon, believed that the accomplishment of their wishes was hampered by the declaration of a certain party in the legislative branch of the Government who desired to hasten the former end.

It is to be remembered that effective intervention in foreign affairs sometimes requires the cooperation of other nations, while, on the other hand, the expectancy of future intervention sometimes stirs up foreign governments to take preventive measures. Intervention, like other matters of diplomacy, sometimes calls for secret preparation, careful choice of the opportune moment, and swift action. It was because of these facts that the superintendence of foreign affairs was intrusted to the Executive and not to the legislative branch of the Government. For these reasons care should be taken not to embarrass the President, who is intrusted with the initiative in all matters of diplomacy; while, on the other hand, the conditions will rarely be such as to require action by the President in matters affecting the peace and dignity of the United States without opportunity to satisfy himself that he has Congressional support.

V.

[English practice.]

That in Great Britain, the principal constitutional Government of Europe when our Constitution was adopted, the making of treaties and all matters affecting her relations with foreign countries were prerogative—that is, executive—appears from Todd (Parl. Gov., volume 1, page 369). Until of late years treaties were not laid before Parliament until after ratification (page 367), and the initiation of a foreign policy, not taking the form of a treaty, belongs to the executive exclusively (page 369).

It is in the light of this conception of the executive character of foreign negotiations and acts concerning foreign relations that our Constitution gave the President power to send and receive ministers and agents to or from any country he sees fit and when he sees fit, and not to send or receive any, as he may think best; also, the power to make treaties—that is, to negotiate with or without agents, as he may prefer, when he may prefer, or not at all, if he prefer; to draw up such articles as may suit him, and to ratify the acts of his plenipotentiaries, instructed by him, the only qualification of his power being the advice and consent of the States in the Senate to the treaty he makes.

These grants confirm the executive character of the proceedings and indicate an intent to give all the power to the President which the Federal Government itself was to possess—the general control of foreign relations.

In Great Britain Parliament can refuse to pass laws to carry out treaties when ratified and binding between the nations; what Parliament can and habitually does do passes into a constitutional precedent. But powers wrested by Parliament from the Crown stand upon a different footing from powers granted in our written Constitution. They partake more of the character of mere might than of functions created to be exercised to given ends. Parliament can do what it has the ability to compel the Crown to submit to; but Congress and the President are not the result of struggles between hostile forces. While, therefore, Congress can refuse to appropriate to carry a treaty into effect, since no one can compel it to do so, and the President can refuse to carry on a war authorized by Congress, or to execute any law passed by Congress. gress, yet such proceedings are not constitutional and could never become constitutional by habit, for our Constitution is written, and each part of the Government represents the will of the whole nation in exercising the functions assigned to it, and rebels against the will of the nation in preventing another part from exercising its functions to the fullest extent.

The President, in making a treaty, is the United States, and speaks the whole mind of the United States. For this very reason it was deemed advisable to safeguard what he does by the advice and consent of the special representatives of the sovereign States in the Senate, since treaties are the most important and binding acts concerning Federal relations, except making war. The solemn power of authorizing war is for the same reason made an exception. But not even the Senate is concerned with the matter of negotiating or preparing treaties, and all that great body of international business which may lead up to treaties or even to a war, which the refusal to receive a minister might occasion, is given to the Executive by the express grants concerning treaties and ministers

That this is a great power is true; but it is a power which all great governments should have; and being executive in the conception of the founders, and even from its very nature incapable of practical exercise by deliberative assemblies, was given to the

The judicial branch of the Government has set a proper example of respect for the other branches in declining to inquire into for-eign affairs even for the purpose of deciding cases. Congress should follow this example, which is but a recognition of the principle that each branch in its proper functions is the ultimate sovereignty of the United States, the sole and final spokesman of the will of the nation.

Otherwise, the principle of mere right will be introduced, and each branch proceed to do or omit whatever the other branches have not means to effectually prevent, which will be the end of government of and by the people and the beginning of an usurped government over the people. Written constitutions, being, like all human contrivances, imperfect, will then have been proven impracticable.

During the first session of the Senate we find that the question of directing the President in regard to foreign affairs was a matter of consideration. In Maclay's Sketches of Debate in the First Senate, page 104, the bill under discussion being one to organize a department of foreign affairs, Senator Maclay says:

The first clause was: "There shall be an executive department," etc. There are a number of such bills, and may be many more, tending to direct the most minute particle of the President's conduct. If he is to be directed how he shall do everything, it follows he must do nothing without direction. To what purpose then is the executive power lodged in the President, if he can do nothing without a law directing the mode, manner, and, of course, the thing to be done? May not the two Houses of Congress, on this principle, pass a law depriving him of all powers? You may see it will not get his approbation. But two-thirds of both Houses will make it a law without him, and the Constitution is undone at once.

It thus appears that even the establishment of an executive department of foreign affairs was regarded as trenching upon the free action of the Executive in its proper sphere.

Prior to the adoption of the Constitution, when all powers were in Congress, a resolution was adopted (1 Stat., 28) which shows the general conception of the business of foreign affairs. It was resolved that an officer have control of the descriptor. resolved that an officer have control of the department of foreign affairs, to reside where Congress or a committee of the States shall sit; that all books and papers relating to the department should be in his custody, no copy of any paper of a secret nature to be made without special leave of Congress; that the correspondence and communications with the ministers, consuls, and agents of the United States in foreign countries, and with the agents of the United States in foreign countries, and with the ministers and other officers of foreign powers with Congress, be carried on through the office of foreign affairs by the said secretary, who is also empowered to correspond with all other persons from whom he may expect to receive useful information relative to his department: Provided always, That letters to the ministers of the United States, or ministers of foreign powers, which have a direct reference to treating or convention of the contract. direct reference to treaties or conventions proposed to be entered into, or instructions relative thereto, or other great national sub-jects, shall be submitted to the inspection and receive the appro-bation of Congress before they shall be transmitted; that he may concert measures with the ministers or officers of foreign powers amicably to procure the redress of private injuries which any citizen of the United States may have received from a foreign power or the subjects thereof, making minutes of all his transactions relative thereto, and entering the letters at large which have passed on such occasions; that he shall use means to obtain from the ministers and agents of the said United States in foreign countries an abstract of their present state, their commerce, finances, naval and military strength, and the characters of sovereigns and ministers, and every other political information which may be useful to the United States; that all letters to sovereign powers, letters of credence, plans of treaties, conventions, manifestoes, instructions, passports, safe-conducts, and other acts of Congress relative to the department of foreign affairs, when the substance thereof shall have been previously agreed to in Congress, shall be reduced to form in the office of foreign affairs, and submitted to the opinion of Congress; and when passed, signed, and attested, sent to the office of foreign affairs to be countersigned and forwarded.

In passing the act to which Maclay objected (July 27, 1789) the title of this officer was merely abbreviated, and he was to "perform and execute such duties as shall from time to time be enjoined on or intrusted to him by the President of the United States, agreeable to the Constitution, relative to correspondence, commissions, or instructions to or with public ministers or consuls from the United States, or to negotiations with public ministers from foreign states or princes, or to memorials or other applications from foreign public ministers or other foreigners, or to such other the constitutions of the constitution of the constitutio matters respecting foreign affairs as the President of the United matters respecting foreign affairs as the President of the United States shall assign to the said department; and, furthermore, that the said principal officer shall conduct the business of the said department in such manner as the President of the United States shall from time to time order or instruct."

This was, practically speaking, the whole law, except that "the secretary for the department of foreign affairs to be appointed in consequence of this act shall forthwith after his appointment be entitled to have the custody and charge of all records, books, and papers in the office of the secretary for the department of foreign affairs heretofore established by the United States in Congress assembled.

It is thus clear that all the power of Congress over foreign affairs was conceived to be transferred by the Constitution from Congress to the President. A secretary to assist him in performing his functions was provided by Congress; but the objection that he was in any way directed how to perform them could not be well taken, at least as the bill, after amendments in the Senate, was passed.

The President was expected to do all that Congress had been doing, and this law provides for no report to Congress about nor any interference by Congress in foreign affairs. Not one of the matters in the resolution above quoted was attempted to be reserved to Congress; but all were evidently believed to be transferred by the Constitution to the Executive, so far as Congress was concerned.

It is needless to say that the proceedings of the Government were conducted accordingly; that correspondence was carried on, ministers received, negotiated with, and sent, and that "such other matters relating to foreign affairs as the President of the United States" chose to assign to the said department were conducted without Congressional interference or comment for many

Mr. Greuhm said that he had mentioned the matter when his letter was made out, but had been informed that but one letter from the King of Prussia to this Government was of record, and that was the one written when Mr. Adams himself took leave (as minister at Berlin, 1801). That was addressed to Congress, and they supposed it had been drawn up according to advice from Mr. Adams.

Mr. Adams rejoined that he remembered it very well; that it had not been drawn up by his advice, and that he had received it as drawn up and delivered to him without objection because he did not wish to make any difficulty at parting and never supposed it would operate as a precedent afterwards. (IV Memoirs of John Quincy Adams, 17, 18.)

Later the Secretary of State sent the following circular letter on the subject:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, March 28, 1853.

Mashington, March 28, 1833.*

Sir: It is observed that special communications from foreign powers intended for the Executive of the United States have been usually addressed to the President and Congress of the United States.

This style was introduced under the old confederation, and was then perfectly proper, but since the Federal Constitution has been formed its inaccuracy is apparent, the whole executive power, particularly that of foreign intercourse, being vested in the President. You will therefore address a note to the minister for foreign affairs, apprising him that all communications made directly to the head of our executive Government should be addressed "To the President of the United States of America" without any other addition.

You will, of course, observe that this relates solely to those communications of ceremony which are made from one sovereign to another—for example, notices of births, deaths, changes in government, etc.—and does not relate to the ordinary diplomatic intercourse, which is to be carried on as usual through this Department.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDWARD LIVINGSTON.

To Henry Wheaton, Esq., Chargé d'Affaires of the United States to Denmark.

(The above letter is a circular and was sent, with the necessary variation in the address, to T. L. L. Brent, chargé d'affaires to Portugal, as No. 36; to C. P. Van Ness, minister to Spain, as No. 38; to C. Hughes, chargé d'affaires to Sweden, as No. 10, and to H. S. Legare, chargé d'affaires to Belgium, as No. 5.)

In 1793 the questions of recognizing the new French Republic, and recognizing or not the treaties with King Louis as still binding, were discussed in the President's Cabinet, and there

*Mr. Frederick Greuhm, minister resident and consul general from Prussia to the United States, was informally requested by Mr. J. Q. Adams, Secretary of State, on November 8, 1817, to make known to his Government that all credential letters from foreign soverigns should be addressed to the President, who, by our Constitution, receives foreign ministers, and not to Congress (to which body Mr. Greuhm's letter was addressed).

decided. A minister from the new Republic was accordingly received, and a proclamation issued by the President, in which he says:

I have therefore thought fit to declare the disposition of the United States to observe the conduct aforesaid (friendly and impartial) toward those powers, respectively, and to exhort and warn the citizens of the United States, etc.

Notwithstanding the bitterness occasioned by our failure to take part with France in the war, the right of the President to thus speak for the United States does not seem to have been questioned by Congress. On the contrary, when the excited French Committee of Public Safety sent a letter addressed to Congress, the House resolved, April 25, 1794, that it be transmitted to the President, "and he be requested to cause the same to be answered on behalf of this House in terms expressive of their sensibility," etc. This was a distinct recognition of the President as the authority to receive and act upon such communications, however addressed.

A bill to make additions to the act for punishing crimes against the United States (debated in the House on May 31 and June 2, 1794), known as the neutrality law, afforded an opportunity for questioning the right of the President, but the debate proceeded on other lines and the law passed was in strict accordance with and in aid of the policy of the President and was urged by him for that purpose.

It seems to have been left for the Jay treaty with England, though hardly more exasperating to the partisans of France, to furnish the first explosion of discontent with the power given to the President over foreign affairs.

That gave rise to a long and memorable debate, when it became necessary to pass laws to carry it into effect, and a call was made upon the President for the instructions he had given to the minister who negotiated it ister who negotiated it.

In the course of this debate powers of Congress in regard to foreign affairs were, it seems, first asserted, based on the right to impeach, the right to regulate foreign commerce, the right to withhold legislation required by treaties, etc.

Mr. Gallatin, favoring the resolutions calling for papers, said that Congress possesses the power of regulating trade. "The treaty-making power delegated to the Evecutive may be considered as clashing with that. The question may arise whether a treaty made by the President and Senate, containing regulations touching obmaking power delegated to the Evectuive may be considered as clashing with that. The question may arise whether a treaty made by the President and Senate, containing regulations touching objects delegated to Congress, can be considered binding without Congress passing laws to carry it into effect. * * He concluded by observing that the House were the grand inquest of the nation, and that they had a right to call for papers on which to ground an impeachment."

Mr. Nicholas said:

It had been said that if the powers of the President and Senate as to treaties were complete, then the House had no right to claim participation; this would not be denied. * * * In the present case he contended the House had a voice.

He argued that the power of the House over the money matters stipulated in the treaty qualified the powers of the President and Senate. In England, "the country from which we had borrowed, and with many other matters, this part of our Constitution," their House of Parliament had exercised a control over the moneyed articles of treaties, and he contended that the House of Representarticles of treaties, and he contended that the House of Representatives has an equal authority here as chief guardians of the purse strings. "Shall it be said that we have borrowed only the form from Great Britain, and not touched the substance? Shall it be said that the House have a discretion as to appropriations, and yet they must make them as directed by a treaty? Unless the House chose and grant that money, it was so far no treaty."

Mr. Swanwick said (page 449) that Congress not only had power to regulate commerce but to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers vested by the Constitution in any office or Department, and that there was no authority out of the purview of this general legislative control—not the treatyof the purview of this general legislative control-not the treatyor the purview of this general legislative control—not the treaty-making power more than others. He said great stress had been laid on the proposition that treaties are the supreme law of the land, but this means supreme over "anything in the constitution or laws of any State," and does not affect the powers of the House. The laws are equally supreme, and it is absurd that treaties should repeal laws. The House would dwindle into a mere board of assessors and all powers by with the President and Senetal It had sessors and all powers be with the President and Senate. It had been said that no nation would treat with us if the House refused to carry out a treaty by appropriations, but gentlemen would probably be surprised to be told that the British House of Company and the probably be surprised to be told that the British House of Company and the probably be surprised to be told that the British House of Company and the probably be surprised to be told that the British House of Company and the probably be surprised to be told that the British House of Company and the probably be surprised to be told that the British House of Company and the Probably British House of Company and the British Ho mons possesses the same power now claimed. He quoted the Federalist (pages 101 and 103) to the effect that "although the House of Representatives is not immediately to participate in foreign negotiations and arrangements, yet from the necessary connection between the several branches of public affairs those particular branches will frequently deserve attention in the ordinary course of legislation and will sometimes demand particular legislative sanction and cooperation," etc.

Mr. Smith said (page 452), referring to the arguments from the British constitution:

Mr. Smith said (page 402), referring to the arguments from the British constitution:

But why introduce this by way of precedent to guide us in construing our own Constitution? They have no such written Constitution as we have; their constitution is entirely made up of usages and laws. Whenever you prove, therefore, that they have an usage like the one that is mentioned, of judging on treaties, you have then proved that such is their constitution, and if our Constitution expressed in terms what theirs expressed by their usages, there could be no doubt but that the House should have the right. In construing a written constitution, to introduce the practice in a country who have no written constitution and have no effect but to mislead. If gentlemen could show us a written constitution in England wherein the treaty-making power is exclusively vested in the King, with the advice of the House of Lords, and under such constitution the House of Commons claiming a right to interfere in the subject, their precedent would then apply; unless, indeed, it were too absurd to be considered as a precedent. He said the two Governments were perfectly dissimilar. Why, then, introduce the practice of that Government as a guide for this? He was well suited with the Constitution of America and wished not to assimilate it to any foreign constitution, and he hoped it would not be usurped and twisted to become like them. Were they about to form a constitution it might be desirable to take whatever was found good in any other; but when the Constitution was already formed and marked out by direct boundaries, in a manner too plain to be mistaken, could it be of any use to inquire what was the constitution and avoided that part of the British constitution as absurd. In England, the King has the sole power of making treaties, but, after the treaty is made, Parliament claim a right, in certain cases, to judge their merits. In this country the convention, in framing their Constitution, had seen fit to add the Senate to the President in the b

Mr. Gallatin (page 465) said that the House had a discretion to cooperate or refuse cooperation, and therefore, where their cooperation was necessary, the treaty could not have full effect and be, properly speaking, the law of the land, if they chose to use their discretion by refusing cooperation. A treaty may not be unconstitutional, but yet not the law of the land, if it embraces objects exclusively granted to a particular branch of the Government. The Constitution does not say what treaties the President may make. The general grant of power is limited by the other parts of the Constitution. The specific legislative powers granted were limitations upon the undefined power of making treaties. The Constitution says the treaty shall be a law. Some gentlemen had declared that the treaty-making power is executive; but a power of making laws can not be termed executive without an absurdity.

He did not claim for the House the power of making treaties,

He did not claim for the House the power of making treaties, but a check upon the treating-making power—a mere negative power. We, he said, are for this stigmatized as rebellious, disorganizers, as traitors against the Constitution; but our opponents claim an unlimited power for the treaty-making authority capable of absorbing all other powers.

Mr. Hartley (page 481) recurred to the argument from the British constitution and denied that Great Britain has a similar constitution to ours. "If the Parliament of Great Britain was to pass a law vesting this power in the King and House of Lords, would the Commons then claim the right of ratifying treaties? But still gentlemen ask, Have not the House as much power as the British House of Commons? He would answer this question by British House of Commons? He would answer this question by saying that the House has as much and no more power than the saying that the House has as much and no more power than the Constitution had given it. And if gentlemen required a further answer he would say that the Legislature of the United States did not possess as extensive power as the Parliament of Britain. That body can change the constitution, alter the religion of the country, and, in short, its powers are really omnipotent. Such unbounded powers are not claimed here. But whether the British House of Commons have the power or not is a question of no consequence. The inquiry was not into the powers of British Parliaments or Houses of Commons, but into the powers of that House, and those powers were found only in the Constitution."

Mr. Madison (page 488) very elaborately discussed questions as

Mr. Madison (page 488) very elaborately discussed questions as to whether a treaty and law were or could be equal or the treaty power paramount, etc., but, it having been determined by the Supreme Court that the later law repeals a treaty, municipally considered, because they are equally the law of the land, it is deemed unnecessary to quote him further.

I have quoted principally from the advocates of the power of the House for two reasons, first, to show that the British continuous are relied more by them, as it was by the relief to the relief.

former showing thereby that treaty making, if not necessarily an executive act, philosophically speaking, was an act which the executive authority always performed, and the latter that, though this might have the executive authority always performed, and the latter that, though this might be so, the executive's authority was qualified or controlled to some extent by Parliament; and secondly, to show that no active power to take the initiative in foreign affairs was claimed, but only a power to withhold cooperation in carrying out

The doctrine that the active management of our foreign affairs was committed to Congress beyond the express grants of legislative power on particular subjects was distinctly repudiated on behalf of his side by Mr. Gallatin, as we have seen.

Mr. Smith referred to the practice of the Government in regard to treaties with Indian tribes as follows:

Having stated the general opinion of the public, as manifested by the friends as well as the enemies of the Constitution, Mr. Smith said he would proceed to show the practice that Congress had, from the commencement of its existence, been conformable to that opinion. Several treaties had been concluded with Indian tribes under the present Constitution. These treaties embraced all the points which were now made a subject of contest—settlement of boundaries, grants of money, etc.; when ratified by the President and Senate, they had been proclaimed by the Executive as the law of the land; they had not even been communicated to the House; but the House, considering them as laws, had made the appropriations as matters of course, and as they did in respect to other laws. The treaties were never discussed, but the requisite sums, as reported in the annual estimates, were included, as matters of course, in the general mass of moneys voted for the war establishment in the item of Indian Department. It was not pretended that the Constitution made any distinction between treaties with foreign nations and Indian tribes; and the clause of the Constitution which gives to Congress the power of regulating commerce with foreign nations, and on which the modern doctrine is founded, includes as well Indian tribes as foreign nations.

He also referred to another practice:

That this House considered a treaty, when ratified by the President and Senate, as the law of the land was further evident from a resolve of the House of the 4th of June, 1790, in these words:
"Resolved, That all treaties made, or which shall be made and promulgated under the authority of the United States, shall from time to time be published and annexed to their code of laws by the Secretary of State."

In consequence of this resolution, the several Secretaries of State had annexed the treaties which had been made to the code of laws as soon as they were ratified by the President and Senate and promulgated by the President.

The resolution calling for papers was adopted and the papers refused, the President saying (Messages and Papers of the Presidents, volume 1, page 194):

refused, the President saying (Messages and Papers of the Presidents, volume 1, page 194):

The nature of foreign negotiations requires caution, and their success must often depend on secrecy, and even when brought to a conclusion a full disclosure of all the measures, demands, or eventual concession which may have been proposed or contemplated would be extremely impolitic, for this might have the pernicious influence on future negotiations or produce immediate incoveniences, perhaps danger and mischief in relation to other powers. The necessity of such caution and secrecy was one cogent reason for vesting the power of making treaties in the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate. The principle on which that body was formed, confining it to a small number of members. To admit, then, a right in the House of Representatives to demand and to have, as a matter of course, all the papers respecting negotiations with a foreign power would be to establish a danger ous precedent.

Having been a member of the general convention, and knowing the principles on which the Constitution was formed, I have ever entertained but one opinion on this subject; and from the first establishment of the Government to this moment my conduct has exemplified that opinion—that the power of making treaties is exclusively vested in the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and that every treaty so made and promulgated thenceforward became the law of the land. It is thus that the treaty-making power has been understood by foreign nations, and in all the treaties made with them we have declared and they have believed that, when ratified by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, they became obligatory. In this construction of the Constitution, exert fine not a doubt or a suspicion has appeared, in my knowledge, that this construction was not the true has acquiesced; for till now, without controverting the obligation of such treaties, th treaty into effect.

In 1798 the question of abrogating the treaties with France arose, and Congress, the President cooperating, passed a law declaring the treaties abrogated by the act of France. But not only did the President cooperate, but this was done as a war measure. The Supreme Court regarded the series of acts, including this, as authorizing or declaring war. (Bar. vs. Tingy, 4 Dallas, 41.) No question was raised as to the power of Congress without the President. On the contrary, the law was reported by a committee to whom had been referred a part of a speech of the President to Congress advocating measures of defense against France, and after he had informed Congress of the violation of the treaties by France. (Special message, May 16, 1797.) the treaties by France. (Special message, May 16, 1797.)

The law was only carrying out the general policy of the President, and with his cooperation, but the manner of passing it was the result of the President's vigorous denunciation of the conduct of the French authorities upon the dismissal of Monroe as minister, when they complimented Monroe and praised the American people, but attacked the American Government. (Special-session message, May 16, 1797.)

The House of Representatives especially was exhorted to beware of endeavors to foster and establish a division, which was insinuated as existing between the Government and people of the United ated as existing between the Government and people of the United States, and told that "to repel by decided and united counsel insinuations so derogatory to the honor and aggressions so dangerous to the Constitution, Union, and ever independence of the nation is an indispensable duty."

It was not a time, therefore, for nice discrimination between the branches of the Government, but to show France that as against her hostile proceedings all branches were united. That was the spirit in which this law was passed, while Congress was engaged in exercising its power to authorize or declare war against France. It should not, therefore, be regarded as evidence of what two-thirds of Congress could do against the will of the President. In the same year, 1798, a question arose as to appropriations for foreign intercourse and the right of the President to appoint ministers, and Mr. Otis said (Annals of Congress, 1798, page 1157):

After so much had been said respecting the constitutional right of the House to refuse an appropriation, Mr. O. observed that he should add but a few remarks. To prevent confusion on this subject, it might be well to state the points in which both sides of the House were agreed and those in which they dissented. It was not denied that the President had the right of nominating public ministers, nor had it been contended that the House possessed the right of fixing their salaries; the doctrine of his friends was merely that the appointment of a minister imposed a moral obligation to give a reasonable salary, and that being once determined it was unjust to reduce it without the best reasons. It was doubted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the office of minister was created by the Constitution and whether it was not competent for this House to fix the destination of a minister, and it was asserted by him that in all cases the House had an anthority to refuse every appropriation. On these last points they were at issue. To explain the reason of his doubt respecting the right of the President to designate the courts to which the ministers should be sent, that gentleman had replied that the same clause in the Constitution which gives the power of appointing ministers to the Executive also gives that of appointing judges of the Supreme Court, which he never pretended to exercise until the number of judges had been ascertained by law. In this argument he hardly appeared to be serious, but he would answer that the same Constitution provides that "a Supreme Court shall be established by law," and it has no existence until created by law. A court is a jurisdiction committed to one or more persons; the jurisdiction is constituted by a law which describes the number of persons to whom it shall be established by that," and it has no existence until created by law. A court is a jurisdicti

But the law and practice as to appointing and receiving ministers and consuls has been elaborately set forth and discussed by Attorney-General Cushing (7 Op., page 242), who concludes:

Further to show that this act can not be reasonably construed as intending to require the President to do what the Constitution, on considerations of public policy, has intrusted to the sole discretion of the Executive, may be mentioned the clause of the act which says, in words, that the President shall appoint a "consul" at Port au Prince. This, if done, would have the effect, according to international usage, of placing the Haitien Empire in diplomatic relation with the United States. It is not presumed that such was the purpose of the lawmakers; yet such is the necessary effect of the law, if the words "shall appoint" are mandatory in operation. If they are mandatory in any case, they are in all; if not mandatory in one case, they are so in none. * * *

The President can, with concurrence of the Sanata, appoint correlation.

The President can, with concurrence of the Senate, appoint consuls at any place whatever, whether they be mentioned in the act or not.

The Attorney-General shows clearly that the appointment of ministers was committed by the Constitution to the discretion of the Executive, and so as to all diplomatic and even consular officers, all the instruments of international intercourse being thus placed in his discretion.

The ordinary method of recognizing a new government was always to receive a minister from it or send one to it; and all such acts are expressly assigned to the President's control, as part of the business of foreign affairs, both by the Constitution and the law organizing the Department of Foreign Affairs.

NATURE OF THE POWERS REQUIRES SECRECY.

In the Madison Papers we find that secrecy was a main object in giving the President and the Senate the treaty power.* On September 7, 1787, a motion was made to add the House of Representatives, because, if treaties were to have the operation of laws, they should have the sanction of laws. The only argument reported against this is "that the necessity for secrecy in the case of treaties forbade a reference to the whole legislature." The motion was defeated—10 States against 1.

The Senate in the uncompleted Constitution having been given the power to make treaties, appoint ambassadors, etc., Mr. Wilson (Madison Papers, page 245) said:

Every nation may be regarded in two relations—first, to its own citizens:

Every nation may be regarded in two relations—first, to its own citizens; secondly, to foreign nations. It is, therefore, not only liable to anarchy and tyranny within, but has wars to avoid and treaties to obtain from abroad. The Senate will probably be a depository of the powers concerning the latter

In this conception of the framers, to avoid wars and make treaties evidently stands for the whole management of foreign relations, and it was intended to give all to the Senate. On page 428 an argument is made against the Senate's having the power to make treaties, wherein it is objected that the treaty power belongs to the Executive, and the British constitution is referred to. On page 469 an attempt is made by Mr. Morris to require legislative ratification of treaties, and Mr. Madison suggested the inconvenience of requiring a legal ratification of treaties of alliance, for purposes of war, etc." Mr. Gorham said:

Many other disadvantages must be experienced if treaties of peace and all negotiations are to be previously ratified; and if not previously the ministers would be at a loss how to proceed. What would be the case in Great Britain if the king were to proceed in this manner? American ministers must go abroad not instructed by the same authority (as will be the case with other ministers) which is to ratify their proceedings.

Mr. Wilson said:

In the most important treaties, the King of Great Britain, being obliged to resort to Parliament for the execution of them, is under the same fetters as the amendment of Mr. Morris will impose on the Senate. It was refused yesterday to permit even the Legislature to lay duties on exports. Under the clause without the amendment, the Senate alone can make a treaty requiring all the rice of South Carolina to be sent to some one particular port.

Mr. Dickinson concurred in the amendment, as most safe and proper, though he was sensible it was unfavorable to the little States, which would otherwise have an equal share in making

Mr. Johnson thought there was something of solecism in saying that the acts of a minister with plenipotentiary powers from one body should depend for ratification on another body. The example of the King of Great Britain was not parallel. Full and complete power was vested in him. If the Parliament should fail to provide the necessary means of execution, the treaty would be violated.

Mr. Gorham, in answer to Mr. Gouverneur Morris, said that negotiations on the spot were not to be desired by us; especially if the whole Legislature is to have anything to do with the treaties. It will be generally influenced by two or three men, who will be corrupted by the ambassadors here. In such a Government as ours, it is necessary to guard against the Government itself being seduced.

An attempt was also made, but defeated, to except treaties of peace from the power of the President and Senate.

In the State conventions to discuss the Constitution arguments as to the treaty power continually repeated that it was executive, and the British constitution, with Blackstone on the King's prerogative right to make treaties, were constantly referred to. (Elliott's Debates, volume 3, pages 506, 508, and 512; volume 4, pages 116, 120, 267, 269, etc.)

CELERITY REQUIRED.

The necessity for executive control to seize with celerity "tides in the affairs of men" is fully discussed in the Federalist, No. 63.

EXPERT KNOWLEDGE REQUIRED.

One idea which finds expression in Todd on the British Constitution, ubi supra, in the resolution of Congress prior to the Constitution as above quoted, in the law forming the Department of ^{*}Mr. Middleton, chairman of the Amelia Island committee, was also with me, and I gave him all the additional information that I possessed concerning it. I showed him the secret laws, those singular anomalies of our system which have grown out of that error in our Constitution which confers upon the legislative assemblies the power of declaring war, which, in the theory of government, according to Montesquien and Rousseau, is strictly an executive act. But as we have made it legislative, whenever secrecy is necessary for an operation of the Executive, involving the question of peace and war, Congress must pass a secretiaw to give the President the power. Now, secrecy is contrary to one of the first principles of legislation, but this absurdity flows unavoidably from that of having given to Congress, instead of the Executive, the power of declaring war. Of these secret laws there are four, and one resolution, and one of the laws, that of June 25, 1812, is so secret that this day it could not be found among the rolls at the Department. Another consequence has also followed from this clumsy political machinery. The injunction of secrecy was removed on the 6th of July, 1812, from the laws previously passed by a vote of the House of Representatives, and yet the laws have never been published. (Memoirs of John Quincy Adams, volume 4, page 32.)

Foreign Affairs, in the Federalist, and in the provision of the Constitution which says that the President shall, from time to time, give to Congress information of the state of the Union, should not be lost sight of in this discussion. And that is that exact information about the relations of the Government with foreign nations and of those nations with each other were regarded, when the Constitution was adopted, not as common property, but as derived from official correspondence with diplomatic agents. Journals were then published; but newspapers entitled to be so called, telegraphs, ocean cables, steamboats, railroads, the multiplicity of books, and the general education of the masses have produced a more or less exact knowledge among the people of matters formerly executive secrets, or, at least, buried in archives and costly tomes. In those days the President alone was supposed to know all that was needed to be known to manage foreign affairs and to get his knowledge from undisclosed correspondence with agents appointed by him. The Constitution is to be read in the light of this fact, and, so read, we can not doubt that foreign affairs were intended to be conducted as they had been in all European countries. tries by the possessor of such knowledge, and that even the initiative in making war was expected to be taken upon a communica-tion from the President of such information, and not upon idle rumors and the tales of travelers. Certain it is that the war with France was begun in that way, Congress following the lead of and seeking knowledge from the President at every step.

It were unreasonable to interpret the Constitution as the work of prophets of such an age as we now live in; but even now really exact knowledge of our relations with Spain and other countries remains an executive possession, and reasons for the wisdom or expediency of any course derived from rumor or newspapers may be wholly refuted by secret information of the Executive from some of our agents abroad. It still remains true, therefore, that the general management of foreign affairs should be left to the one having charge of the diplomatic agents and in continual correspondence with them.

Vattel (first published in 1773) thus speaks of treaties:

But all rulers of states have not a power to make public treaties by their own authority alone; some are obliged to take the advice of a senate, or of the representatives of the nation.

It was undoubtedly either from the British constitution or from this general European conception of the kingly or other personal sovereign-making treaties, with or without the advice of a deliberative body, that the President's power was derived, he being, in a limited sense, the nearest representative we have of the kings of the prevailing monarchical systems.

Vattel speaks of the ordinary way of making treaties through instructed plenipotentiaries, their work to be ratified. To give the President authority to appoint such plenipotentiaries in his discretion was to place him on a par with sovereigns in the manner of making treaties, and confirms the conception of him as similar to personal heads of monarchies.

In No. 63 of the Federalist, which discusses the treaty-making power, every reason advanced for giving or confining the power to the President and Senate is based on a view, not so much of treaties alone, as of foreign affairs generally. Nothing is there said to intimate that any part of foreign affairs is withheld from the exclusive control of the President and Senate.

It has now been shown that under express grants the President is to make treaties as he may see fit, and appoint and receive ambassadors and other ministers. The only qualifications seriously contended for are by reason of express grants on particular subjects to Congress, which subjects do not embrace the subject-matter of the resolution in question. It has also been shown that foreign affairs generally were understood by the great formative first Congress to be transferred to the President and Senate.

Disregarding the particular grants to Congress, treaties on all other subjects at least are to be made by the President and Senate or not at all. The President and Senate are thus granted power to make a treaty with the Republic of Cuba and a fortiori to recognize its existence. So the President and Senate are granted power to send a minister to the Republic of Cuba and a fortiori to recognize its existence, and the President alone is granted power to receive a minister from the Republic of Cuba and a fortiori to recognize its existence. The President and Senate are general managers of foreign affairs, and part of such management is to recognize or deal with new governments, and so are empowered to deal with and recognize the Republic of Cuba.

All duties in connection with foreign relations not otherwise specified fall within the sphere of the Executive.

The Constitution, by its own internal evidence, shows that all duties in connection with foreign relations not otherwise speci-

First. The general principle has been already noticed that if a power is confided to one branch of the Government, it can not be presumed to be granted also to one of the other branches of the Government, to be exercised in the same cases and for the same independent, yet its independence may not yet be recognized by purposes. To make such an assumption would be to deny the wisdom of our forefathers and the homogeneity of their work.

Second. It is among the executive powers.

The following powers are expressly granted to the executive branch of the Government:

By and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur—

And the President-

Shall nominate and, with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint mbassadors, other public ministers, and consuls—

Congress having no power to alter the method of their appointment; and-

He shall receive ambassadors and other public ministers.

The power to receive public ministers, which is confided in the President alone, implies the power to decide who should be received; and this implies the power to examine their credentials and ascertain whether the foreign potentates by whom the credentials are made out are in fact sovereigns.

dentials are made out are in fact sovereigns.

The power to make treaties implies a complete power over diplomatic negotiations. A treaty is an express contract or agreement with a foreign government. All contracts or agreements with foreign governments may be put into the form of treaties, although many of temporary character and minor importance remain in the rank of informal understandings. Diplomatic negotiations are negotiations toward the formation of agreements or contracts, formal or informal. These pegotiations are agaried on contracts, formal or informal. These negotiations are carried on through the Secretary of State, who is appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, our public ministers, who with the advice and consent of the Senate, our public ministers, who are likewise appointed, and the public ministers of other governments, who are received and recognized by the President alone.

Treaties or formal agreements with other Governments are made, drafted, and informally agreed to by the President before they are submitted to the Senate, although, on very rare occasions, as in the Administrations of Washington and Polk, the President may request the advice of the Senate beforehand. The "advice and consent" of the Senate, however, is a phrase which has a technical meaning, signifying simply a vote, being adopted from the language of the British act of Parliament. In connection with treaties and appointments it has always been practically construed treaties and appointments it has always been practically construed as referring to a vote taken after the preliminary signature of the treaty or after the nomination.

The President, therefore, is charged by the Constitution with the drafting of all public treaties, as well as with the conducting of all negotiations leading up to them. These treaties, when they of all negotiations leading up to them. These treaties, when they receive the "advice and consent" of the Senate, become part of "the supreme law of the land" by Article VI of the Constitution; and thus come within the provision that the President "shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

Thus, by the ordinary rules of construction of a document of this kind, the President becomes charged with the diplomatic affairs of the United States. All diplomacy, apart from such trivial matters as the exchange of compliments or procuring of social introductions, consists in the making of international agreesocial introductions, consists in the making of international agree-ments, either temporary and informal or permanent and formal. The President's power is subject simply to two of the famous "checks" of the Constitution, namely, that he must obtain the ratification of the Senate to the appointment of his diplomatic agents, and to the promulgation of any diplomatic agreement which is intended to be sufficiently formal and permanent in its nature to have the force of law which is intended to be sufficiently formal and permanent in its nature to have the force of law.

The "recognition" of independence or belligerency of a foreign power, technically speaking, is distinctly a diplomatic matter. It is properly evidenced either by sending a public minister to the government thus recognized, or by receiving a public minister therefrom. The latter is the usual and proper course. Diplomatic relations with a new power are properly and customarily inaugurated at the request of that power, expressed through an envoy sent for the purpose. The reception of this envoy, as pointed out, is the act of the President alone. The next step, that of sending a public minister to the nation thus recognized is priof sending a public minister to the nation thus recognized, is primarily the act of the President. The Senate can take no part in it at all until the President has sent in a nomination. Then it acts in its executive capacity, and, customarily, in "executive session." The legislative branch of the Government can exercise no influence over this step, except, very indirectly, by withholding appropria-

There is another consideration also, which conclusively shows that the recognition of a foreign power belongs to the sphere of diplomacy, and, therefore, to the executive branch of the Government. Two points are first to be decided before the independernment. Two points are first to be decided before the independence or belligerency of a foreign body is "recognized:"

First. Whether the independence or belligerency in fact exists;

the older nation from which it has separated itself. War may still be waging between them, and the recognition of the independence of the new nation may be regarded as a casus belli by the old one. National sympathy may be aroused in the United States to the extent of being willing to go to war with the old nation for the sake of encouraging the new one. Such was the feeling of France toward the United States in the Revolutionary war and of the United States toward Tevres in 1897. National nation for the sake of encouraging the new one. Such was the feeling of France toward the United States in the Revolutionary war, and of the United States toward Texas in 1837. National sympathy, on the other hand, may not be aroused with sufficient unanimity to justify the nation's agents, whether executive or legislative, to take such a step. The question may, therefore, be left to be decided partly by questions of expediency, and these questions are mainly diplomatic in methods of solution. It is the executive branch of the Government which is best qualified to judge whether recognition would be a casus belli; whether neutral nations would join in it; whether it would jeopardize negotiations pending with the nation which would be expected to resent the recognition. Questions of expediency may arise which affect the interests not of the United States alone, but of the new government which seeks recognition. Hasty action by the United States alone might be of no avail, and, at the same time, might tend to prevent other neutral nations from taking the same step. If, on the other hand, the United States, by diplomatic negotiations, would obtain cooperation from other neutral nations, their joint action might force the independence of the new country to be immediately recognized even by the country new country to be immediately recognized even by the country from which it was endeavoring to separate.

The interaction of these various questions of expediency is familiar to anyone who has studied the history of our relations to the South American insurrectionists during Monroe's Administration. The United States was then recovering from the effects of the war, and required caution in championing the affairs of would-be sister republics. President Monroe was continually con-sidering three different classes of problems: First, whether South American independence was actually an accomplished fact;

Second, whether Great Britain or other European countries would join him in its recognition; and would join him in its recognition; and Third, whether premature action on the part of the United States, while valueless for purposes of assistance to the insurrectionists, would jeopardize the making (and afterwards the ratification) of the treaty ceding Spain's possessions in Florida and abandoning its claims to Oregon.

We have said that the first act of recognition is, customarily, the receiving formally of an envoy from the country recognized.

We may add that simple recognition per se in its ultimate

We may add that simple recognition per se in its ultimate analysis is not an executive any more than it is a judicial act. The simple finding of the existence of a fact is not a complete executive act any more than it is a complete legislative or judicial act. In judicial procedure a finding of fact, in order to have the effect of an adjudication, must be followed by a judgment, which has of an adjudication, must be followed by a judgment, which has the effect of requiring some person or persons to do or refrain from doing some thing or things. So a simple declaration of fact by the executive department is directly operative only so far as it is, in effect, information that certain action will be taken by the executive under its express constitutional powers; or that such and such municipal laws of the United States will be executed in a certain way; or that certain rules of international law will be admitted by the executive as in present operation. The municipal a certain way; or that certain rules of international law will be admitted by the executive as in present operation. The municipal laws of the United States may be changed at will by Congress, although their enforcement must be intrusted to the executive. So far as municipal laws are concerned, Congress can, in effect, control the future operations of the executive by enacting, for instance, that under such and such circumstances the laws should apply to the case of a foreign people not yet independent as if they really were independent; or that they should apply to the specific case of some foreign people actually named as if they were independent. Congress can thus, by changing the municipal law to that extent, make the question of independence of any foreign nation an entirely immaterial circumstance. It has, however, no control over international law further than to enact that the rules of international law shall not be respected by the United States. Nor can it enact that something is a fact which is not a fact. It can not make a foreign people independent, although it can enact that, for any specified purpose or purposes, it shall be regarded as independent by our executive department or by our Congress. Meither can Congress control international law, which is based upon the consensus of different nations. International law regards independence as a question of fact, and does not recognize it until it is a fact, irrespective of sympathy. Nor can the legislative branch of the Government hold any communication with foreign nations. The executive branch is the sole mouthpiece of the nation in communication with foreign sovereignties. Foreign nations communicate only through their respective executive departments. Resolutions of their legislative departments upon diplomatic matters have no status in international law. In the department of international law, therefore, properly speaking, a Congressional recognition of belligerency or independence would be a nullity.

All of these considerations were familiar to the statesmen who framed the Federal Constitution; and it is clear, from the terms of that instrument, that all findings of fact as to emergencies be-yond the sea, for purposes of international law and diplomacy, were intended to be infrusted to the executive department; while as to such findings of fact for the purposes of the administration of our municipal law, the only doubt could be whether they belong to the executive or to the judiciary.

This disposes of the first of the two proposed joint resolutions now under consideration.

The second of these proposed joint resolutions contemplates negotiations for a future treaty to be carried on by the legislative branch of the Government. No such proposal could receive recognition by a foreign country; and if such a proposal had emanated from the House of Representatives in the early days of our constitutional history there can be little doubt that it would have been resented by the Senate as an infringement upon its own prerogatives, as well as upon the sphere of the Executive.

This view is confirmed by examination of the express powers granted to the legislative branch of the Government. That branch is intrusted with "all legislative powers," but with no powers that are not properly legislative. Legislation is the making of laws, and laws are rules of conduct. A simple declaration of the existence of a fact is not a legislative act; neither is an offer to another nation to open negotiations. If a mere finding of fact is not in general a legislative act, especially is it not a legislative act when the fact to be found is one occurring in a foreign country. It would not be a legislative act to declare that in a lative act when the fact to be found is one occurring in a foreign country. It would not be a legislative act to declare that in a suit of Smith vs. Jones, pending in a Federal or State court, the truth of the controversy was with Smith and not with Jones. Is it any more a legislative act to declare that in the case of Smith vs. Jones, pending in a Spanish court and involving a question of possession of real property, Smith and not Jones has the truth on his side in swearing that he is in possession of the property? Is it, then, any more a legislative act to declare that in the controversy with Cuba Gomez and not Weyler has the facts on his side?

Undoubtedly not. For the purposes of the administration of our municipal law, it is an executive act when it relates to a question which the Executive must decide, and a judicial act when it arises in court (although, for reasons which will be stated, the judiciary in deciding the question follows the executive).

the judiciary in deciding the question follows the executive).

Congress can help the Cuban insurgents by legislation in many ways, but it can not help them legitimately by mere declarations, or by attempts to engage in diplomatic negotiations, if our interpretation of the Constitution is correct. That it is correct will be shown by the opinions of jurists and statesmen of the past.

NATURE OF LEGISLATIVE POWER

Legislation is universally defined substantially as the power to enact laws

The following definitions of law are familiar:

A rule of civil conduct, prescribed by the supreme power in a state, commanding what is right and prohibiting what is wrong.—Blackstone.

A command to a course of conduct; a command being the expression of a wish or desire conceived by a rational being that another rational being shall do or forbear, coupled with the expression of an intention in the former to inflict some evil upon the latter, in case he do not comply with the wish.—

The present claim that the mere assertion of the existence of a state of fact in a foreign country is legislation makes the following remarks of Judge Penrose in the matter of American Banking and Trust Company (17 Penn. Co. Ct. R., 274, 280) pertinent:

There are some things, however, beyond the power of the legislature, even irrespective of constitutional restrictions. It can not change the laws of nature, the properties of numbers, or the meaning of words. It can not modify an axiom. Water will not boil at 110° nor freeze at 52°; 12 times 12 will always be 144; insufficient can not be made the equivalent of sufficient, bad the equivalent of good, and things which are not equal to the same thing will not, in spite of the most solemn enactment to the contrary, be equal to each other.

VII.

THESE VIEWS ARE SUSTAINED BY THE WEIGHT OF OPINION AMONO JURISTS.

While the question of boundary between the executive and legislative spheres in their foreign relations has been frequently a subject of discussion, there never has been, and probably never a subject of discussion, there never has been, and probably never will be, an actual conflict between these two branches of our Government in this particular. There are, therefore, no judicial opinions of controlling authority. Such references as may be found in reported cases are obiter and valuable only as indicating the general understanding of the Constitution among the judges. The subject has been little considered by text writers. The importance of the citations under this heading is therefore much portance of the citations under this heading is therefore much less than that of the citations from legislative and executive proceedings which will be made under our next and last heading.

Judicial utterances relating to the power to recognize the independence or belligerency of a foreign government.

For the reasons above stated some of the judicial utterances upon this point fail to indicate whether the power to recognize a foreign government resides in the executive or legislative departforeign government resides in the executive or legislative department, the court saying simply that it resides in the "political department" or in the "Government." Strictly speaking, it resides for the purpose of a case in court in the judiciary; but the judiciary have no means of deciding the question by taking evidence, and must for this reason, as well as because the existence of a foreign government is a fact which must be decided in the same way for the purpose of all private litigations, take judicial notice of it. Upon questions of judicial notice the court consults the best attainable means of information—dictionaries, public documents, or whatever else it may be. The question thus arises: What authority shall the court consult in the ascertainment of a What authority shall the court consult in the ascertainment of a treaty by the processes of judicial notice? The courts have very wisely looked to the other departments of the Government, both as the best means of information and in order that there should be no conflict. There never has been any conflict between the legislative and the executive, and hence, when the Legislature has in any way indirectly recognized the existence of such a fact, the court may take notice of its action. Sometimes the recognition has been by the executive alone, in which case the court can look to executive action. When the executive has not yet recognized independence or belligerency, as the case may be, the court holds that the fact is not established for the purpose of judicial notice. Where the Supreme Court has referred to the legislative as well as to the executive department, the question thus referred has

Where the Supreme Court has referred to the legislative as well as to the executive department, the question thus referred has always, with one exception, been one not strictly foreign. Thus in Foster vs. Neilson (2 Pet., 253, 307), United States vs. Arredondo (6 Pet., 691, 711), and Garcia vs. Lee (12 Pet., 511) the controversy related to the ownership of property within the United States which had formerly, indeed, belonged to Spain, and whose title depended upon the former boundary between the United States and Spain; but the treaties upon which the title in part depended were not self-executing, and the question before the court was really a question of boundary, and not of belligerency or independence. The not altogether consistent dicta in Jones vs. United States (137 U. S., 202) are in a case where the question at issue was whether certain territory belonged to the United States. So far as the question before the court was one of foreign belligerency or independence at any given period, the court, if it specified at all to what department it referred for information (with the one exception aforesaid), has specified the executive

(with the one exception aforesaid), has specified the executive department of the Government.

United States vs. Hutchings (2 Wheeler's Criminal Cases, 543), in 1817, was a prosecution for piracy. The question arose whether at a certain date the Republic of Buenos Ayres was independent. Counsel argued that our independence began with the Declara-tion of Independence in 1776, and therefore that the independence of Buenos Ayres "commenced with their declaration of independence," was a matter of notoriety throughout the world, and was proved by certain correspondence between President Monroe and the Spanish minister. Chief Justice Marshall was of opinion—

That a nation became independent from its declaration of independence only as respects its own government and the various departments thereof. That before it could be considered independent by the judiciary of foreign nations it was necessary that its independence should be recognized by the executive authority of those nations. That as our Executive had never recognized the independence of Buenos Ayres, it was not competent to the court to pronounce its independence.

In United States vs. Palmer (3 Wheat., 610, 634), arising two months later, the Chief Justice used language applicable to the legis ative as well as to the executive department, and this is the only exception to the general rule above stated in regard to such cases.

Williams vs. Suffolk Insurance Company (3 Sumn., 270, 273) involved the question whether the fisheries at the Falkland Islands belonged to Buenos Ayres. It was decided by Mr. Justice Story, whose remarks are of especial interest, because he had discussed this very question in his Commentaries on the Constitution, and had, according to the general plan of the Commentaries, left it there an open one. He now said:

It is very clear that it belongs exclusively to the executive department of our Government to recognize from time to time any new governments which may arise in the political revolutions of the world; and until such new governments are so recognized they can not be admitted by our courts of justice to have or to exercise the common rights and prerogatives of sovereignty.

Mr. Justice Story further goes on to say that "this doctrine was fully recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States in Gelston vs. Hoyt (3 Wheat., 246, 324)." In that case the opinion had been written by himself and used simply the word "government." The learned justice's interpretation of the opinion would indicate that whenever the word "government" had been used in this connection the executive department has been intended; and it is also noticeable that the case thus referred to was decided at the same term of court with the Palmer case above referred to at the same term of court with the Palmer case, above referred to, so that these remarks of Mr. Justice Story tend to confirm the inference which may be drawn from the Hutchings case that the reference to the legislative department of the Government in the Palmer case was an inadvertence.

Williams vs. Suffolk Insurance Company, above quoted, came up for review in the Supreme Court of the United States (13 Pet., Mr. Justice McLean said (page 420):

And there can be no doubt that when the executive branch of the Government, which is charged with our foreign relations, shall in its correspondence with a foreign nation assume a fact in regard to the sovereignty of any island or country it is conclusive on the judicial department. And in this view it is not material to inquire, nor is it the province of the court to determine, whether the Executive be right or wrong. It is enough to know that in the exercise of his constitutional functions he has decided the question. Having done this under the responsibilities which belong to him, it is obligatory on the people and the Government of the Union.

In Kennett vs. Chambers (14 How., 30), the question arose whether Texas was an independent government in September, 1836. Chief Justice Taney said (page 46) that it "belonged to the Government" to decide when Texas became independent. He then refers to the President's message of December 22, 1836, as evidence that it had not yet become independent at that time, and says (pages 50 and 51):

It is a sufficient answer to the argument to say that the question whether Texas had or had not at that time become an independent state was a question for that department of Government exclusively which is charged with our foreign relations.

The department thus referred to is clearly indicated by its further characterization (page 51) as "the treaty-making power."

The Prize Cases (2 Bl., 635) are not strictly in point, because they refer to domestic, not to foreign, difficulties. Mr. Justice Grier (page 670) says:

Whether the President, in fulfilling his duties as commander-in-chief, in suppressing an insurrection has met with such armed hostile resistance and a civil war of such alarming proportions as will compel him to accord to them the character of beligerents is a question to be decided by him, and this court must be governed by the decisions and acts of the political department of the Government to which this power was intrusted.

The italics are the court's own.

In the recent case of United States vs. Trumbull (48 Fed. Rep., 99, 104), referring to the late civil war in Chile, Judge Ross says: It is beyond question that the status of the people composing the Congressional party at the time of the commission of the alleged offense is to be regarded by the court as it was then regarded by the political or executive department of the United States. This doctrine is firmly established.

In the Itata (56 Fed. Rep., 505, 510) the circuit court of appeals for the ninth circuit, speaking through Judge Hawley, said:

The law is well settled that it is the duty of the courts to regard the status of the Congressional party in the same light as they were regarded by the executive department of the United States at the time the alleged offenses were committed.

2. Utterances of text writers relating to the power to recognize the independence or belligerency of a foreign government.

This is a subject not touched upon in some commentaries, for the reason that such commentaries often undertake to show only the judicial exposition of the Constitution, and say but little upon the judicial exposition of the Constitution, and say but little upon subjects which have not been of judicial cognizance. Of the few jurists who have treated this subject, probably the only one who has supposed any right of recognition to reside in Congress was Mr. Rawle. He states that the legislative branch has a higher right than the executive in this particular, but does not discuss the point, and cites no authority, apparently supposing it to be an undisputed one, and consequently giving it no careful consideration. (Second edition, pages 195, 196.) He seems ignorant of the constitutional debates, which had practically settled the point to the contrary, and under the circumstances his opinion is not to be regarded as of much weight. regarded as of much weight.

The first real discussion of this question by a text writer is to be found in the Commentaries of Mr. Justice Story. It was not the plan of these commentaries to decide open questions. He therefore simply states the arguments, although, in dictating his personal opinion, in favor of the executive power. Afterwards, as has already been pointed out, in the case of Williams vs. Sufas has already been pointed out, in the case of williams vs. Suffolk Insurance Company, he has stated most positively that the power resided solely in the executive. He says of the power to receive ambassadors and ministers that it "is always an important, and sometimes a very delicate, function, since it constitutes the only accredited medium through which negotiations and friendly relations are ordinarily carried on with foreign powers."

He proceeds as follows (2 Story on the Constitution, sections 1566 and 1567):

But a much more delicate occasion is when a civil war breaks out in a nation, and two nations are formed, or two parties in the same nation, each claiming the sovereignty of the whole, and the contest remains as yet undecided, flagrante bello. * * The exercise of this prerogative of acknowledging new nations or ministers is therefore under such circumstances an executive function of great delicacy, which requires the utmost caution and deliberation. * * If such recognition is made, it is conclusive upon the nation, unless, indeed, it can be reversed by an act of Congress repudiating it. If, on the other hand, such recognition has been refused by the Executive, it is said that Congress may, notwithstanding, solemnly acknowledge the sovereignty of the nation or party (citing Rawle). These, however, are propositions which have hitherto remained as abstract statements under the Constitution, and therefore can be propounded not as absolutely true, but as still open to discussion if they should ever arise in the course of our foreign diplomacy. The Constitution has expressly invested the Executive with power to receive ambassadors and other ministers. It has not expressly invested Congress with the power either to repudiate or acknowledge them. * * *

properly be conferred on any other than the executive department will admit of little doubt. That it should be exclusively confided to that department without any participation of the Senate in the functions—that body being conjointly intrusted with the treaty-making power—is not so obvious. Probably the circumstance that in all foreign governments the power was exclusively confided to the executive department, and the utter impracticability of keeping the Senate constantly in session, and the suddenness of the emergencies which might require the action of the Government, conduced to the establishment of the authority in its present form. It is not, indeed, a power likely to be abused, though it is pregnant with consequences often involving the question of peace orwar. And in our short experience the revolutions in France and the revolutions in South America have already placed us in situations to feel its critical character and the necessity of having at the head of the Government an Executive of sober judgment, enlightened views, and firm and exalted patriotism.

Clearly only the general plan of not deciding open questions in these commentaries was the learned justice's only reason for not more positively expressing dissent from the propositions of Mr. Rawle; and, as has already been shown, his views upon this point were in accord with those of Chief Justice Marshall as expressed upon the Hutchings trial in 1817. He refers also to the chapter on M. Genet and the neutrality proclamation of 1793 in Marshall's Life of Washington; and all through that chapter it is clear that the Chief Justice agrees with Washington and his Cabinet in considering the recognition of a new government to be an executive

Mr. Pomeroy is much more positive in the statement of his opin-m. He says (Pomeroy's Constitutional Law, 669, 670, and 672):

All foreign relations are thus confided exclusively to the President or to him in connection with the Senate. * * * * Of the unlimited extent and transcendent importance of this function thus confided to the Executive, either alone or in connection with the Senate, there can be no doubt. * * *

can be no doubt. * * *
Congress may pass resolves in relation to questions of an international character; but these can only have a certain moral weight; they have no legal effect; they can not bind the Executive. The necessity for this is evident; negotiations generally require a certain degree of secrecy; one mind and will must always be more efficient in such matters than a large deliberative assembly. * *
The President can not decare war; Congress alone possesses this attribute. But the President may, without any possibility of hindrance from the legislature, so conduct the foreign intercourse, the diplomatic negotiations with other governments, as to force a war, as to compel another nation to take the initiative; and this step once taken, the challenge can not be refused.

Mr. Wharton expresses his opinion in the following headnote: "Such recognition determinable by Executive." (Wharton's International Law Digest, second edition, page 551.)

3. Utterances of courts and text writers on extent of legislative power.

No attempt, so far as we are aware, has ever been made by the Federal Legislature to decide the merits of a pending controversy by a mere declaration. We have already argued that such a declaration would be merely the expression of an opinion, and that it would not have any further force, because it would not in its nature be a legislative, but rather a judicial, act, and that it therefore would not be included within the grant of legislative powers by the first article of the Constitution; that, in other words, while Congress may have power to help one party or the other to a controversy by legislation, it can not decide the controversy by a quasi judicial utterance.

It is a general principle that acts by a legislative body which are not an exercise of legislative power are utterly void, even though they may not be expressly forbidden (Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, sixth edition, page 207):

But when only the legislative power is delegated to one department and the judicial to another it is not important that the one should be expressly forbidden to try causes or the other to make laws. The assumption of the judicial power by the legislature in such a case is unconstitutional, because, although not expressly forbidden, it is, nevertheless, inconsistent with the provisions which have conferred upon another department the power the legislature is seeking to exercise.

And it is said that that which distinguishes a judicial from a legislative act is that the one is the determination of what the existing law is in relation to some existing thing already done or happened, while the other is a predetermination of what the law shall be for the regulation of all future cases falling under its provisions.

He quotes also the following definition from Ervine's Appeal (16 Pa. St., 256, 266):

That is not legislation which adjudicates in a particular case, prescribes the rule contrary to the general law, and orders it to be enforced.

Legislative attempts to decide controversies between individuals are therefore held to be void, not merely because they contravene provisions of the constitutional bills of rights, but because they are not contained within the grant of legislative powers.

reasoning is applicable as well to controversies between foreign bodies as to those between individual citizens of our own country.

Legislation is always defined as the power to make laws—the treaty-making power under our Constitution being regarded as quasi legislative (2 Story on the Constitution, 1519). A law is not a statement of a fact, but the establishment of a rule of conduct; although, of course, rules of evidence may be established by enactments whose effect is to provide that certain things which are not true shall for certain purposes be taken as true.

VIII

THAT THE POWER TO RECOGNIZE BELLIGERENCY OR INDEPENDENCE OF A FOREIGN GOVERNMENT IS EXECUTIVE IN ITS NATURE, HAS BEEN RECOGNIZED BY THE WEIGHT OF AUTHORITY IN CONGRESS, AND ALMOST WITHOUT EXCEPTION BY THE LEGISLATIVE BRANCH.

1. Acquiescence by Congress.—It is entirely erroneous to sup-1. Acquiescence by Congress.—It is entirely erroneous to suppose that the present question is a novel one. The boundaries between the legislative and executive powers in relation to foreign affairs have been debated since the very foundations of the Government. The right to recognize the independence of a foreign state was discussed with great ability at the time of the South American revolutions, and received some attention again at the time of the revolution in Texas. The weight of authority, legislative as well as executive, was strongly against the right of Congress to interfere. In each case the President, when the time ame for recognition, acted in concert with Congress for the obvious reason that affirmative action might involve the nation in war, and thus force Congress to make large appropriations and otherwise assist in the settlement of the controversy thus opened. The question has occasionally arisen since for discussion, as in 1864 and 1877. It has never been fully debated, however, since the time of Monroe.

The number of instances in which the Executive has recognized a new foreign power without consulting Congress (because not anticipating consequences which made such consultation necessary) has been very great. No objection has been made by Congress in any of these instances. The legislative power has thus for one hundred years impliedly confirmed the view that the right to recognize a new foreign government belonged to the Executive; and if it is correct doctrine that the same power can not be exercised for the same purposes by two different branches of the Govern-ment, this implied approval is conclusive of the whole present controversy.

Before quoting the discussions which have arisen directly from the point now involved, it may be well to refer to other interesting Congressional debates upon the general boundaries of the treaty-making power. A treaty is, by the express language of our Constitution, part of the supreme law of the land. In its self-executing provisions, therefore, it repeals all prior acts of Congress with which it conflicts, as has repeatedly been ruled. It may repeal not only acts of Congress, but acts of State legislatures, as by repealing laws prohibiting aliens from owning real estate. It may add territory to the Union, as in the cases of Louisiana and Florida. add territory to the Union, as in the cases of Louisiana and Florida, in which case concurrence of the legislative branch of the Govm which case concurrence of the legislative branch of the Government is necessary only in case an appropriation is required for the purchase money. It may surrender territory to which the United States has long confidently laid claim, as in the case of the surrender of Texas by the Spanish treaty of 1819, the surrender of a part of Maine by the Ashburton treaty of 1842, and the surrender of British Columbia by the Oregon treaty of 1846. In the celebrated resolution of 1796, with reference to Jay's treaty, the House of Representatives attempted to secure a share in our foreign relations, but its claim was denied by the President with the support of the Senate. In 1820 the attempt was renewed by Mr. Clay in of the Senate. In 1820 the attempt was renewed by Mr. Clay in proposing a resolution reciting that as Congress has the power to dispose of the territory of the United States, "no treaty purporting to alienate any portion thereof is valid without the concurrence of Congress." After opposition by Mr. Lowndes, the leader of the House, the resolution was dropped, and the treaty, with its abandonment of Texas, went through without further protest. In 1846 a large part of the session of Congress was taken up with debates over the Oregon boundary question, but when the President and the Senate abandoned the whole of our claim to the territory north of latitude 49°, the House of Representatives made no protest.

of latitude 49°, the House of Representatives made no protest.

Many treaties imperatively demand Congressional legislation in order to carry out the good faith of the Government. The fact, therefore, that, whether by affording a casus belli or otherwise, the treaty-making power is one which enables the President and Senate to force the hand of the House of Representatives, as it enables them to repeal almost any previous legislation in which the House of Representatives has taken part, does not affect the existence of this power as an Executive function. There are, as has already been stated, two ways in which the

There are, as has already been stated, two ways in which the existence of a new foreign sovereignty would naturally be recognized: First, and most properly, by the President alone in receiving its envoy; and, second, by the President and Senate in sending an envoy (the latter method not needing previous legislation, as the envoy would be an officer whose position is established by the Constitution itself, and who could either give his services gratuities. tously or be reimbursed out of a contingent fund, as was done in the case of President Monroe's Scath American commissioners in 1818). Clearly a recognition by treaty would be proper, and a claim by the House of Representatives of a superior right would be resented by the Senate as an infringement of its prerogatives in its executive functions. But the right of the President to act in this way upon consultation with the Senate is no higher than his right to proceed in the other and more customary way entirely upon his own responsibility.

SOUTH AMERICAN REVOLUTIONS UNDER MONROE'S ADMINISTRATION.

Apparently the first discussion of the right to recognize a foreign power was in 1818 in reference to the new Republics of Buenos Ayres, Colombia, and Chile. Statesmen took part in those debates who were familiar with all of our history after 1789, and the state-ments that the question then raised was a novel one may be ac-ments that the question then raised was a novel one may be accepted as true.

These discussions were precipitated by Mr. Henry Clay, then Speaker of the House of Representatives. It will be remembered that the recognition of the South American republics was his pet measure and the one upon whose success he was mainly basing his aspirations for future leadership; and that he was assuming a position of opposition to President Monroe and his Cabinet, whose hands he was endeavoring to force, claiming that they were lag-gard in this matter. The fact, therefore, that he never in these debates claimed any power in Congress to recognize the independ-ence of a foreign government by a declaratory act or joint resolu-tion is one of very great weight. He clearly bore in mind during the whole controversy the distinction between legislative and nonlegislative measures, and endeavored in vain to find some method of accomplishing his desires by genuine legislation which should be within the constitutional powers of the House over which he presided and in whose debates he took, at the same time, a leading

On March 24, 1818 (Annals of Congress, page 1468), he began the contest in Committee of the Whole upon the appropriation bill, by a motion to amend the bill so as to appropriate the sum of $18,000 as the outfit and one year's salary of a minister to be deputed from the United States to the independent provinces of the River Plata in South America.

He accompanied this motion with some remarks upon the question involved in his motion of a formal recognition of the independence of the South American States mentioned.

Evidently his attention was called over night to the unconstitutional feature of his proposition in that it purported to recognize independence before the Executive had acted, for on the following day he redrafted his amendment and put it in the following form from 1500. lowing form (page 1500):

For one year's salary and an outfit to a minister to the united provinces of the Rio de la Plata, the salary to commence and the outfit to be paid whenever the President shall deem it expedient to send a minister to the said united provinces, a sum not exceeding $18,000.

In his speech upon this amendment he said, in answer to the objection that the Executive had not yet acted (page 1499):

objection that the Executive had not yet acted (page 1499):

If we make the previous appropriation we act upon our constitutional responsibility, and the President afterwards will proceed upon his; and so if he make the previous appointment. * * * Each branch of Government, moving in its proper sphere, would act with as much freedom for the influence of the other as was practically attainable.

There was great reason, Mr. C. contended, from the peculiar character of the American Government, in there being a perfect understanding between the legislative and the executive branches in relation to the acknowledgment of a new power. Everywhere else the power of declaring war resided with the executive. Here it was deposited with the legislature. If, contrary to his opinion, there were even a risk that the acknowledgment of a new state might lead to war, it was advisable that the step should not be taken without a previous knowledge of the will of the war-making branch. He was disposed to give to the President all the confidence which he must derive from the unequivocal expression of our will. This expression he knew might be given in the form of an abstract resolution declaratory of that will; but he preferred at this time proposing an act of practical legislation.

He expressed his conviction (page 1500):

He expressed his conviction (page 1500):

That, without unconstitutional interference with the Executive power, with peculiar fitness we might express in an act of appropriation our sentiments, leaving him to the exercise of a just and responsible discretion.

Mr. Clay was answered by Mr. Forsyth, of Georgia, afterwards Secretary of State, and then the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Mr. Forsyth said upon this point (page 1502):

Another objection, not less obvious, was presented by the constitutional division of the powers of the Government. Heretofore the President and Senate were left to the exclusive management of the foreign intercourse of the United States. Ministers were received from other powers, and sent from this country to other governments with whom political or commercial interest required us to negotiate, and the House of Representatives contented itself with its constitutional check upon the exercise of this authority, satisfied that they could at all times prevent its improvident exertion by withholding appropriations from those missions the public interest did not require.

Mr. Forsyth proceeded with these significant remarks (page

Were it really true that the Executive Magistrate had discovered a criminal indifference on this subject, Mr. F. said he would be among the most eager to express such an opinion in the only form in which an opinion could be expressed, by a resolution of the House boldly and openly declaring its dislike of the course which had been pursued and recommending the necessary change. * * Let us not at least pretend to give the Executive a discretion already possessed, thus diminishing his responsibility without adding to our own.

The most important speech against Mr. Clay's resolution seems to have been made by Mr. Lowndes, of South Carolina, then chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and universally acknowledged to be the leader of the House. Mr. Lowndes spoke for an hour and a half (page 1525), but unfortunately his speech has not been preserved, except so far as it may be gathered from references by the other speakers. He said (page 1526) "that it is the exclusive right of the Executive to manage our foreign relations;" that (page 1607) this was a wise provision; that "we should present a single front," since the President only can communicate, negotiate, and treat with foreign nations (page 1571).

Mr. Smith, of Maryland, one of the oldest and most prominent members of the House, opposed the proposition as "novel and wholly unprecedented," saying (page 1538):

The Constitution has given to Congress legislative powers; to the President the direction of our intercourse with foreign nations. It is not wise for us to interfere with his powers; his plans may be digested with wisdom; our interference might destroy them, and perhaps at the moment when they would otherwise have succeeded. Each branch had better confine itself to the duties assigned to it by the Constitution.

Referring to the conduct of our first Administration during the French Revolution, he said (page 1539):

Did Congress on that occasion direct the conduct of General Washington? Did that Congress tell him that he did not understand what he ought to do, and that they would instruct him? No, sir; they left him to exercise the powers vested in him by the Constitution—to the exercise of his own judgment; they sustained him by no act. Let us act in like manner by the present Chief Magistrate; he has not asked for our assistance; he has asked no outfit for a minister to La Plata. When he does, it will be time to consider the subject.

Mr. Smyth, of Virginia, made a long argument upon the constitutional question in favor of the position that "the measure proposed is an act of usurpation, an invasion of the executive author-(page 1570). He said (pages 1570 and 1571):

ity" (page 1570). He said (pages 1570 and 1571):

The Constitution grants to the President, by and with the consent of the Senate, power to appoint ambassadors and public ministers and to make treaties. According to the usage of the Government, it is the President who receives all foreign ministers and who determines what foreign ministers shall or shall not be received. It is by the exercise of some one of these powers, in neither of which has this House any participation, that a foreign power must be acknowledged. Thus the acknowledgment of the independence of a new power is an exercise of executive authority; consequently, for Congress to direct the Executive how he shall exercise this power is an act of usurpation. To give such direction must be an act of usurpation, if it shall have any effect. * * * You possess the power of impeachment, and consequently may discuss and by resolution express an opinion on any past act, either of the executive or of the judiciary, but you have no right to give a direction to either. The President is responsible for the proper execution of his constitutional powers; he may be punished for abusing them or for neglect of his duty. This House is the proper body to prosecute him if he shall fail to do his duty. * *

Mr. Holmes, of Massachusetts (Maine), also one of the leaders, and speaking in support of the amendment, claimed that it was only in aid of the President, and not an interference with his discretion (page 1583). Mr. Henry St. George Tucker, of Virginia, took the same ground (pages 1589-1591, and 1596), saying:

We command nothing—we leave everything to the control of the Executive discretion.

Mr. Clay, in summing up the debate, said (pages 1607 and 1608): Mr. Clay, in summing up the debate, said (pages 1607 and 1608):

That no part of the Constitution had said which should have precedence—the act making an appropriation for paying a minister, or the act of sending one. * * * [They] should be simultaneous, or if either had preference, the act of appropriating for his pay should precede the sending of the minister * * * [quoting certain acts], from which it appeared, he said, that Congress had constantly pursued the great principle of the theory of the Constitution for which he now contended, that each department of the Government must act within its own sphere, independently and on its own responsibility. * *
Mr. C. said his theory of the Constitution on this particular subject was that Congress had the right to appropriate money for foreign missions—the President the power to use it. * * * Both being before him—the power and the means of executing it—the President would judge on his own responsibility whether or not it was expedient to exercise it. In this course, Mr. C. said, each department of the Government would act independently without influence from or without interference with each other.

Mr. Clay, in the same speech, made the following further remarks

Mr. Clay, in the same speech, made the following further remarks (pages 1616 and 1618):

(pages 1616 and 1618):

There are three modes under our Constitution in which a nation may be recognized: By the executive receiving a minister; secondly, by its sending one thither; and, thirdly, this House unquestionably has the right to recognize in the exercise of the constitutional power of Congress to regulate foreign commerce. To receive a minister from a foreign power is an admission that the party sending him is sovereign and independent. So the sending a minister, as ministers are neversent but to sovereign powers, is a recognition of the independence of the power to whom the minister issent. * * This House, Mr. C. said, had the incontestable right to recognize a foreign nation in the exercise of its power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. Suppose, for example, we passed an act to regulate trade between the United States and Buenos Ayres, the existence of the nation would be thereby recognized, as we could not regulate trade with a nation which does not exist.

Mr. Clay always maintained that the clause that Congress had power to regulate commerce with foreign nations gave Congress the power to recognize the independence of a foreign country; but, although he was often very anxious to secure such a recogni tion by legislative action, he never found any practical means of carrying out his theory.

The practical construction of the Constitution from the beginning has shown that the theory is unsound for the following reason: That a regulation of commerce need not apply to the whole of the territory of any foreign nation. In other words, if a foreign nation is divided into various provinces, colonies, etc., Congress has the undoubted power to make regulations of commerce which shell apply to only one or more of such subdivisions. Such regulations shall apply to only one or more of such subdivisions. Such regulations might be casus belli, but do not constitute recognitions of the independence of the subdivision with which commerce is regulated.

One very ancient provision is that by which commercial regulations are made to depend upon the question whether importa-tions are from this side of the Cape of Good Hope or beyond it— a line which represents no national boundary. This distinction dates from the First Congress, which was controlled by the men who established the Constitution, and which itself adopted the first ten amendments. (Act of July 31, 1789, chapter 5, section 2; act of August 4, 1790, chapter 35, sections 2 and 39.) Section 3095 of the Revised Statutes provides for importations into the collection districts "adjoining the Dominion of Canada." This is evidently intended to apply to importations from Canada, as it permits importations in a manner which would not be applicable to transactions in a manner which would not be applicable. to transatlantic commerce. This provision is taken from section 92 of the revenue-collection act of 1799, which also applied to "the districts on the rivers of Ohio and Mississippi." These districts adjoined the Spanish province of Louisiana; but no similar privileges were permitted to the Spanish province of Florida.

An act of 1866 (Revised Statutes, sections 2508 and 2509) makes a special regulation with regard to certain commerce with New Brunswick. Special regulations with respect to tonnage fees affect the Dominion of Canada alone (sections 1723 and 4222). These statutes speak of that Dominion as if it were an independent power, but never have been considered as importing a recognition of an unclaimed independence. The power of Congress would be very much cut down if it had in each regulation of commerce to treat a foreign nation as a whole.

Section 3006 recognizes "the proper authorities of the British Provinces." Section 3008 makes special regulations with regard to forfeitures of merchandise from "the British North American Provinces." Section 3002 makes special provision for exportations to Chihuahua, in Mexico. (See also sections 3003 and 3004.) Special privileges were given to "merchandise imported from the British North American Provinces adjoining the United States" by an act of 1846 (Revised Statutes, 3053). Further privileges are given by an act of 1850 (section 3054) and by an act of 1845 (section 3056). Another act of 1850 provides for reciprocity in certain matters with "the colonies hereinafter mentioned," namely, "Canada, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, and Prince Edwards Island, or either of them."

The act of May 24, 1890, chapter 292, provides that certain privi-leges to Canadian vessels shall cease when a "reciprocal privilege has been annulled, revoked, or rendered inoperative by said Government of the Dominion of Canada." Does this recognize the independence of that "Government?"

To claim that the power to regulate commerce with foreign na-tions involved a recognition of the independence of the nations with whom commerce is regulated would imply that no nation which is not independent can regulate commerce. It is, on the contrary, a familiar fact that Canada and many other colonies of Great Britain regulate their own commerce with practical independence to that extent.

From 1789 to the present day the legislative branch of our Government to make a regulation of foreign commerce turn upon the ernment to make a regulation of foreign commerce turn upon the independence of the country whose commerce is to be regulated, while to give the word "nations" in the Constitution so narrow a meaning would give to the grant of legislative powers an unsuspected and unreasonable interpretation.

Mr. Clay declared (page 1616) that all he desired by the present amendment was to convey to the President an expression of our willingness that the Government of Buenos Ayres should be recognized. His amendment, however, was defeated by a vote of 115 to 45 (page 1646) on March 28, 1818.

On the previous evening, as reported by John Quincy Adams, then Secretary of State, President Monroe had had an interview with a member of the Senate with reference to the power in question, and had informed the Senator that he was very willing to tion, and had informed the Senator that he was very willing to receive advice as to the feelings of Congress, complaining only of "the angry, acrimonious course pursued by Mr. Clay." He also said with reference to Cabinet meetings in the fall of 1817 (4 Memoirs of John Quincy Adams, page 71):

That at the time the questions were proposed whether the Executive was competent to acknowledge the independence of Buenos Ayres, and, if so, whether it was expedient; that it had been concluded the Executive was competent; but that it was not expedient to take the step without the certainty of being supported in it by the public opinion, which, if decidedly favorable to the measure, would be manifested by measures of Congress.

This remark possibly referred to a Cabinet meeting on December 6, 1817, with reference to Mr. Clay's then projected "motion to acknowledge the Government of Buenos Ayres and perhaps Chile" (id., page 28).

Doubtless the failure to offer this motion was due to Mr. Clay's conviction that it would be unconstitutional and therefore ineffective. The President had already during the recess of Congress consulted the Cabinet as to an immediate recognition of Buenos Ayres (id., page 13).

On January 2, 1819, (id., pages 204 and 206), Monroe's Cabinet considered the question of the power to recognize Buenos Ayres.

Mr. Calhoun advised acting in concurrence with Great Britain

(an act clearly practicable only by the Executive). Mr. Crawford advised acting by sending a minister there—

Because the Senate must then act upon the nomination, which would give their sanction to the measure. Mr. Wirt added that the House of Representatives must also concur by assenting to an act of appropriation. And the President, laughing, said that, as those bodies had the power of impachment over us, it would be quite convenient to have them thus pledged beforehand.

Mr. Adams thought that the first minister should come from the country seeking recognition, and said:

As to impeachment, I was willing to take my share of risk of it for this measure whenever the Executive should deem it proper. And, instead of admitting the Senate or House of Representatives to any share in the act of recognition, I would expressly avoid that form of doing it which would require the concurrence of those bodies. It was, I had no doubt, by our Constitution, an act of the Executive authority. General Washington had exercised it in recognizing the French Republic by the reception of Mr. Genet. Mr. Madison had exercised it by declining several years to receive, and by finally receiving Mr. Onis; and in this instance I thought the Executive ought carefully to preserve entire the authority given him by the Constitution, and not weaken it by setting the precedent of making either House of Congress a party to an act which it was his exclusive act and duty to perform.

Mr. Crawford said:

Mr. Crawford said:

He did not, however, deny, but admitted, that the recognition was strictly within the powers of the Executive alone.

On March 30, 1818, Mr. Clay's amendment, which had been made in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of taking the yeas and nays, was renewed by Mr. Anderson, of Kentucky, when the bill was reported to the House. The only speech on the renewal of the motion was made by Mr. John C. Spencer, of New York, who said mages 1850. said (page 1654):

I believe most firmly that we have the constitutional power to legislate on this and every other subject connected with our foreign relations or with the regulation of commerce. I hold it to be a power concurrent with that of the executive branch, and believe it to be one of the most important which this House possesses. I would make a perpetual claim to the right on every proper occasion, and I would place it on the records of the nation as an eternal evidence of that claim. Since then, no injury can flow from its adoption, because it will be left to the Executive discretion.

The motion was again defeated by a vote of 115 to 45 (page 1655).

The position thus taken by Mr. Spencer is clearly correct from a constitutional point of view. A provision for a foreign mission "whenever the President shall deem it expedient" to send a minister is a strictly legislative act. The objection to the resolution is not in its words, but in its probable effect. It was premature, and thus likely to embarrass the executive in its diplomatic work, and thus postpone rather than hasten the end which all desired.

On May 10, 1820, the House of Representatives debated the following resolution, introduced by Mr. Clay (Annals of Congress, page 2223):

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide by law a suitable outfit and salary for such minister or ministers as the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may send to any of the governments of South America which have established and are maintaining their independence of Spain.

This resolution was opposed by John Sergeant and by Lowndes, but was carried, amid much surprise, by a vote of 80 to 75 (Id., page but was carried, amid much surprise, by a vote of 80 to 75 (Id., page 2230; 5 Memoirs of John Quincy Adams, page 108).

Mr. Lowndes, at an earlier period of the same session, had endeavored to force the hand of the President by legislation, introducing a bill authorizing and directing him to occupy Florida and establish a temporary government there.

On February 9, 1821, Mr. Clay again moved his ten-thousand-dollar appropriation for a minister to any South American government "which has established and is maintaining its independency of Spain." The resolution was opposed by Lowndes and others, and defeated by a vote of 86 to 79. (Annals of Congress, pages 1071 and 1077.) On the following day he introduced the following resolution (page 1081):

Resolved, That the House of Representatives participates with the people of the United States in the deep interest which they feel for the success of the Spanish provinces of South America which are struggling to establish their liberty and independence, and that it will give its constitutional support to the President of the United States whenever he may deem it expedient to recognize the sovereignty and independence of any of the said provinces.

A debate ensued upon this resolution, in which some members opposed it as an encroachment upon the Executive, while others defended it as not attempting to interfere with his discretion, but merely assuring him of the support of Congress if he should decide to take affirmative action. Others still somewhat curiously insisted that the recognition of a new foreign government must be a conjoint action of the three branches—legislative, executive, and

John Sergeant, of Philadelphia, a well-known commentator of the Constitution, and one of the leaders of the American bar, as well as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, declared the inter est of the House in the success of the South American revolutions and its willingness to support the President "whenever he may deem it expedient to recognize the sovereignty and independence of any of the said provinces." Mr. Sergeant stated his objections to the last clause of the resolution as follows (Annals of Congress, 1820 and 1821, page 1089):

1820 and 1821, page 1089):

His objections were, in general terms, that it expresses an individual opinion, and professes to give a pledge which must be utterly inefficacious: that it is not a legislative act, and is not to lead to a legislative act; that it contains a declaration by which neither this House, the President, nor the Senate would be bound; that it would involve the House in difficulties on a constitutional ground; that if Congress wish a recognition, having the power equally with the executive, they should effectuate their wish by a legislative act. * * * That however independent of the executive as an individual this House might be, yet with respect to the executive as an ananch of the Government, it was important that this House should not disturb the harmony of the different departments of the Government as adjusted by the Constitution itself, and that it should not rush from its sphere and jostle others in their course.

Apparently Mr. Sergeant, while conceding the constitutional queston to be an open one (speaking as he was to a hostile House), was himself of the opinion that a concession of this right to Congress would "disturb the harmony of the different departments of the Government as adjusted by the Constitution itself." He was referred to by another member as an upholder of the execu-

Mr. Clay (page 1088) "concluded that both Congress and the Executive had this power, but that the most regular, ordinary, and usual course was by the Executive, and it was therefore proper to assure him of the support of this House." His conclusion as to Congressional power probably was based upon his argument above. quoted concerning the commerce clause of the Constitution. first clause of the resolution was carried by a vote of 134 to 2; the second clause by a vote of 87 to 68.

Mr. Adams says of this resolution that it "was ingeniously adapted to its only object, which was that of covering its defeat of the preceding day." (5 Memoirs of John Quincy Adams, page

A committee of two members was appointed to lay these resolutions before the President. Mr. Clay, on February 19 (pages 1179 and 1180), made the following report from the committee:

That the committee had, according to order, presented the resolution to the President; that the President assured the committee that, in common with the people of the United States and the House of Representatives, he felt great interest in the success of the provinces of Spanish America which are struggling to establish their freedom and independence, and that he would take the resolution into deliberate consideration with the most perfect respect for the distinguished body from which it had emanated.

It will be noticed that this language would apply equally well

It will be noticed that this language would apply equally well to a resolution presented by any State legislature.

On January 31, 1822, Mr. Trimble of Kentucky, one of the most radical supporters of Mr. Clay, introduced a joint resolution, by which the President was "authorized and requested to acknowledge the independence of the Republics of Colombia," and to exchange ministers; and declaring that "Such of the Spanish provinces in South America as have established and are maintaining their independence of Spain ought, in like manner, to be acknowledged," etc. This resolution was a covert attempt to extend the function of the legislature, by claiming a power to "authorize" without assuming to direct. At Mr. Trimble's request it was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (page 982), but was there dropped. Meanwhile, on January referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (page 982), but was there dropped. Meanwhile, on January 30, the House, on motion of Mr. Nelson of Virginia, had requested the President to lay before it the documents bearing on the South American question "as it may be consistent with the public interest to communicate." (Pages 825, 828.)

In response thereto the President sent in his well-known message of March 8, 1822 (Annals of Congress, page 1238), in which, after stating that in his opinion the time had come to recognize these Republics, he said:

Should Congress concur in the view herein presented, they will doubtless see the propriety of making the necessary appropriations for carrying it into effect.

This message he prefaced with the statement that he considered it his duty-

To invite the attention of Congress to a very important subject, and to communicate the sentiments of the Executive on ft, that should Congress entertain other sentiments, then there may be such cooperation between the two departments of the Governments as their respective rights and duties may require

This clearly refers to the right of the executive department President) to receive ministers, the right of the executive department (President and Senate) to send ministers in return, and the right of the legislative department to decide whether or not these latter ministers should be paid salaries and provided with suitable

The House resolutions, very carefully drawn with reference to the distribution of constitutional power, were passed substantially as reported from the Foreign Affairs Committee by Mr. Russell, of Massachusetts (pages 1320 and 1403):

Resolved, That the House of Representatives concur in the opinion expressed by the President in his message of the 8th of March. 1822, that the late American provinces of Spain which have declared their independence and are in the enjoyment of it ought to be recognized by the United States as independent nations.

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to prepare a bill appropriating a sum not exceeding $100,000 to enable the President of the United States to give due effect to such recognition.

It has been claimed by some that President Monroe finally admitted power in the legislative branch to recognize a new government. This is not correct. What he did acknowledge was the importance of consulting the legislative branch when a step was about to be taken whose expediency might be doubted, and which would necessarily result in a request for appropriations.

A note by the President, supposed to date from 1820 or 1821, has been found among his papers. It seems to refer to the resolu-tion of May 10, 1820, or February 10, 1821. Referring to the attitude which had been taken by the Administration, he said:

It is believed that that attitude would have been perfectly safe, while it was undoubtedly very strong and imposing. The vote of the House of Representatives reenforced it, and being not obligatory as a measure, ought not be considered in any other light. It is hoped that it will not. On that side, it must be admitted, is the danger.

TEXAS

Early in 1836 resolutions of the legislature of Connecticut and various memorials were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, praying for the recognition of the inde-pendence of Texas. Mr. Clay, on June 18, 1836, reported the fol-lowing Senate resolution (Gales & Seaton, page 1848):

Resolved, That the independence of Texas ought to be acknowledged by the United States whenever satisfactory information shall be received that it has in successful operation a civil government capable of performing the duties and fulfilling the obligations of an independent power.

Mr. Clay said (pages 1847 and 1848):

Mr. Clay said (pages 1047 and 1040):

The recognition of Texas as an independent power may be made by the United States in various ways: First, by treaty; second, by the passage of a law regulating commercial intercourse between the two powers; third, by sending a diplomatic agent to Texas, with the usual credentials; or, lastly, by the Executive receiving and accrediting a diplomatic representative from Texas, which would be a recognition as far as the Executive only is competent to make it. In the first and third modes the concurrence of the Senate in its executive character would be necessary; and in the second, in its legislative character. The Senate alone, without the cooperation of some other branch of the Government, is not competent to recognize the existence of any power.

power.

The President of the United States, by the Constitution, has the charge of their foreign intercourse. Regularly he ought to take the initiative in the acknowledgment of the independence of any new power. But in this case he has not yet done it for reasons which he without doubt deems sufficient. If in any instance the President should be tardy, he may be quickened in the exercise of his power by the expression of the opinion, or by other acts, of one or both branches of Congress, as was done in relation to the republics formed out of Spanish America.

formed out of Spanish America.

These remarks show that Mr. Clay still maintained the theory of the right of recognition under the commerce clause; a theory which, as already pointed out, is based upon misapprehension, and which has never yet been expressed in any practical form.

It is clear that Mr. Clay did not consider that the Senate "in its legislative character" could take part in the recognition of a foreign government by a direct declaration.

The resolution is merely an expression of the sense of the Senate, and is of unquestionable constitutionality.

In the debate upon the resolution on July 1, Mr. Preston said "that he had with difficulty restrained himself from offering an amendment to recognize the independence of Texas immediately."

amendment to recognize the independence of Texas immediately." Mr. Webster said (page 1915):

He was willing to go so far as to vote funds to enable the President to send out a proper minister. But against a direct recognition he thought there existed strong objections. It was the proper function of the President to take the lead in this matter.

The resolution was adopted unanimously (page 1928). In the House of Representatives, Mr. Bell moved on June 27 for an outfit and salary for a minister to Texas. His resolution was laid on the table by a vote of 135 to 56, on the ground that the Foreign Relations Committee had the matter under advisement (page 4499). On July 4 that committee reported through its chairman, Mr. John Y. Mason, of Virginia. This report sets up no claim that Congress has the right to recognize a foreign power. It says (Report No. 854, Twenty-fourth Congress, first session):

By the Constitution of the United States the duty of conducting negotia-tions and of superintending our relations with foreign states is devolved on the President.

Two resolutions were reported by Mr. Mason, the first being similar to that which had been adopted by the Senate, and the second expressing pleasure that the President had taken steps to inquire into the matter. The House was about to adjourn sine die, and hence the resolutions were passed under the previous question, cutting off the desire of John Quincy Adams and others to delay them. o debate them (page 4621).

At the following session, on December 21, 1836, President Jackson sent in his well-known message, stating in detail "the considerations that have governed the Executive in continuing to occupy the ground previously taken in the contest between Mexico and Texas." It contains the following familiar passage (Gales & Seaton, pages 1138 and 1139):

In the preamble to the resolution of the House of Representatives it is distinctly intimated that the expediency of recognizing the independence of Texas should be left to the decision of Congress. In this view, on the ground of expediency, I am disposed to concur, and do not therefore consider it necessary to express any opinion as to the strict constitutional right of the Executive, either apart from or in conjunction with the Senate, over the subject. It is to be presumed that on no future occasion will a dispute arise, as none has heretofore occurred, between the Executive and Legislature in the exercise of the power of recognition. It will always be considered consistent with the spirit of the Constitution, and most safe, that it should be exercised, when probably leading to war, with a previous understanding with that body by whom war can alone be declared, and by whom all the provisions for sustaining its perils must be furnished. Its submission to Congress, which represents in one of its branches the States of this Union and in the other the people of the United States, where there may be reasonable ground to apprehend so grave a consequence, would certainly afford the fullest satisfaction to our own country, and a perfect guarantee to all other nations, of the justice and prudence of the measures which might be adopted.—Congressional Debates, Volume XIII, part 1, pages 1138 and 1139.

President Jackson plainly was of the conjuion that in a doubtful

President Jackson plainly was of the opinion that in a doubtful case, when international complications might be involved, the President should not recognize a revolutionary government without the assent of Congress. His language is so carefully guarded that no inference can be made with entire confidence as to the proper course if the Executive were strongly of the opinion that facts justifying the recognition of independence did not exist.

On January 11, 1837, Mr. Walker, of Mississippi, offered in the Senate a resolution (not a joint resolution) which recited the practical independence of Texas, and resolved as follows:

It is expedient and proper, and in perfect conformity with the laws of nations and the practice of this Government in like cases, that the independent political existence of said State be acknowledged by the Government of the United States.

The resolution was not adopted until March 1 (page 1013).

In the House the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which the message had been referred, reported the following resolution from Mr. Howard on February 21 (page 1880):

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to —— in the bill for the civil and diplomatic expenses for the Government a salary and outfit for such public agent as the President may determine to send to Texas.

On February 27 a motion was made to amend the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill by inserting the following provision (page

The proposed amendment was vigorously debated as to the existence of independence and the advisability of recognizing it. Little was said as to the representative functions of the Executive and the Legislature.
Mr. John Quincy Adams said (page 2060):

He objected to this proposition on the ground that the act of recognition of a foreign power had heretofore always been an Executive act of this Government. It was the business and duty of the President of the United States, and he, Mr. A., was not willing to set the example of giving that recognition on the part of the legislative body without recommendation of the Executive.

Mr. Hamer, answering this argument on behalf of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, said (page 2061):

The Executive had referred it to us for the expression of an opinion on our part. He did not choose to act without some such expression. Why, then, do we send it back to him without action on the part of Congress? Let us give an intimation of our wishes on the subject which will respond to the call of the President, and serve as a guide to his proceedings in the future.

Mr. Shepard moved the following amendment, which was ac-which was accepted (page 2064):

Whenever the President of the United States shall receive satisfactory evidence that Texas is an independent power, and that it is expedient to appoint such a minister.

Thereupon, on the suggestion of Mr. Cambreleng, the constitu-tional doubt as to the propriety of the provision was removed by striking out the word "independent" before the words "Republic

It thus appears that great care was taken by both Houses not to assume for the legislative branch any power directly to recognize a new foreign government, but that the responsibility was left entirely with the Executive.

Not even in connection with the recognition of the South American Republics have the real facts been so misunderstood as here.

MISSION TO MEXICO, 1842.

On April 13, 1842, in the debate upon the appropriation act, Mr. Linn, of New York, moved to strike out the provision for a minister to Mexico. In the course of his remarks he said (Congressional Globe, Appendix, page 514):

One of the most important functions bestowed on the Executive of this nation is his control of our foreign intercourse. * * * The power of this House as a coordinate branch of our Legislature over our foreign intercourse is rather incidental than direct or express, and yet may, as it should be both potent and controlling. Accordingly, from the orgigin of this Government to the present time, this House has exercised this power, in the negative form, of either confining the appropriations within the limits of its own judgment and discretion or of withholding them from particular branches of the service.

Mr. Linn then proceeded to show how powerful a weapon this right to appropriate or withhold appropriations had become.

Mr. Pickens, in reply, made the following remarks (Congressional Globe, page 418):

He did not intend to enter into this debate, but when he heard the remarks of the gentleman from New York he could not repress the feelings they excited. He believed that some alterations in our diplomatic arrangements were necessary, but he was willing to leave that matter to the direction of the Executive, who was constitutionally charged with it.

The debate upon Mr. Linn's amendment was protracted and exciting, but no further references were made to the constitutional question; and the amendment was finally withdrawn.

In the Presidential campaign of 1844 one of the issues was the In the Presidential campaign of 1844 one of the issues was the maintenance of the claim of the United States that Oregon extended to latitude 54° 40′, or the southern boundary of Russian America. President Polk was elected partly upon this issue. At that time, by the conventions of October 20, 1818, and October 6, 1827, the United States and Great Britain were in joint occupancy of the disputed territory, an occupancy which either contracting party could, "in case either should think fit at any time after the 20th of October, 1828, on giving due notice of twelve months to the other contracting party, terminate." Early in 1846 it was understood that the Administration were contemplating the surrender of our claim to the whole of Oregon north of latitude 49°. This called forth a number of resolutions in both Houses of Con-This called forth a number of resolutions in both Houses of Congress with the aim of forcing the President's hand by compelling him to give notice of termination of the joint occupancy.

In the Senate Mr. Hannegan, of Indiana, introduced a resolution declaring that our title extended to latitude 54° 40°, and that its abandonment would be dishonorable. Mr. Calhoun introduced a set of resolutions including the following:

set of resolutions, including the following:

Resolved, That the power of making treaties embraces that of settling and fixing boundaries between the territories and possessions of the United States and those of other powers in cases of conflicting claims between them in reference to the same.

Senator Haywood, of North Carolina, pronounced both sets of resolutions as premature, the President as yet having taken no action (Congressional Globe Appendix, page 46), Mr. Calhoun's resolutions also expressing views upon the question.

On January 8, 1846, the Committee on Foreign Affairs reported

On January 8, 1846, the Committee on Foreign Affairs reported a joint resolution in mandatory form that the President give the desired notice. On February 10 this was taken up for consideration, together with Mr. Hannegan's and Mr. Calhoun's resolutions, and a resolution of Mr. Crittenden authorizing the President to give the notice in his discretion (pages 350 and 351).

Meanwhile the Committee on Foreign Relations of the House of Representatives, through Mr. C. J. Ingersoll, of Pennsylvania, had also reported a joint resolution directing the President to give this notice. The minority of the committee (Messrs. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky; Truman Smith, of Connecticut, and Caleb B. Smith, afterwards in Lincoln's Cabinet) reported that it "is not a matter for the decision of Congress, and upon it this House at presmatter for the decision of Congress, and upon it this House at present refrains from expression of any opinion" (pages 138 and 139.)
On February 9 the majority resolution was adopted by a vote of 163 to 54.

The Senate debated the various resolutions until April 16, when, The Senate debated the various resolutions until April 16, when, on motion of Senator Allen, of Ohio, that of the House of Representatives was substituted for the one which had been reported to the Senate. Mr. Reverdy Johnson then moved a substitute similar to the Crittenden resolution, containing the words "at his discretion." Mr. Breese, of Illinois, moved to strike out the words "at his discretion." The motion was defeated, 30 to 22, and Mr. Johnson's adopted, 30 to 24. The resolution was then passed, 40 to 14 (pages 680-683).

On April 18 the House of Representatives, on motion of Mr. Robert Dale Owen, of Indiana, struck out the words "at his discretion" and inserted the words "as requested," by a vote of 100 to 87, and the resolution as thus amended passed, 144 to 40 (pages to 87, and the resolution as thus amended passed, 144 to 40 (pages 691 and 692). A conference committee was appointed, consisting of Messrs. Berrien, Corwin, and Haywood from the Senate, and C. J. Ingersoll, Owen, and Hilliard from the House (pages 703 and 704). This committee reported a resolution substantially in the form proposed by Mr. Johnson, and it was carried in the Senate by a vote of 42 to 10, and in the House by a vote of 142 to 6 (pages 717, 720, and 721). The resolution, omitting the preamble, was as follows:

was as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, at his discretion, to give to the Government of Great Britain the notice required by the second article of the said convention of the 6th of August, 1827, for the abrogation of the same.

It was approved April 27, 1846. (9 Stat., 10.)

In June of the same year the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, by treaty abandoned our claim to the territory north of latitude 49°. This treaty became part of the supreme law of the land, although not concurred in by the legislative branchof the Government (the Senate acting in its executive capacity). It was even an irrepealable law, for the territory in dispute having been once surrendered to Great Britain, it was no longer in the power of any branch of our Government to recover it, except in the power of any branch of our Government to recover it, except by arms. The question was one of vastly greater importance than the mere recognition of a new foreign government, but the House of Representatives entered no protest.

RECIPROCITY TREATY OF 1854.

This treaty also contained a provision for its termination upon one year's notice. It provided for reciprocal free trade between the contracting parties in certain articles, and therefore entirely disarranged the revenue system at the time of the war. The notice to terminate it was given in pursuance of a joint resolution of January 18, 1865 (13 Stat., 566), which not only passed the Senate without question on the ground of its interference with executive functions, but was approved by President Lincoln, who in the previous year had taken very high ground against the right of the legislative branch of the Government to recognize or refuse to recognize a foreign government. The desire for the termination of this treaty was almost unanimous. The only references to any constitutional question were raised by Mr. Collamer, of Vermont (Congressional Globe, pages 210 and 211), who took the ground that a treaty interfering with the revenue system of the Government was either unconstitutional or at least inconsistent with the theory of the Constitution except so far as it might be ratified by theory of the Constitution except so far as it might be ratified by statute. Mr. Collamer stated that the Cabinet of which he had been a member was of this opinion, and for that reason disapproved of the proposed reciprocity treaty.

Either to this reason or because of a desire to avoid constitutional collisions over a measure which was certain to be adopted (for Mr. Lincoln and an overwhelming majority of the Senate were in favor of the measure) the failure to raise constitutional points is probably due. Mr. Lincoln had just been in sharp conflict with the House of Representatives upon a similar constitutional point, as will be shown, and doubtless in this matter he was as desirous of obtaining the advice of Congress as had been Mr. Monroe in 1822 and General Jackson in 1836.

EMPEROR MAXIMILIAN-1884.

On April 6, 1864, a joint resolution was introduced by Mr. Henry W. Davis, chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives, as follows (page 1408):

It declares that the Congress of the United States are unwilling by silence to leave the nations of the world under the impression that they are indifferent spectators of the deplorable events now transpiring in the Republic of Mexico, and that they therefore think fit to declare that it does not accord with the policy of the United States to acknowledge any monarchical government erected on the ruins of any republican government in America under the auspices of any European power.

Speeches were made in support of this resolution by himself and by Mr. S. S. Cox, of Ohio, and it was passed unanimously, no constitutional question being suggested. Mr. Brooks, of New York, however, said: "I have no objection to the joint resolution York, however, said: "I have no objection to the joint resolution if it be not a mere paper fulmination. I do object, however, to paper thunder. If it means anything, I am in favor of the resolution. If not, I am opposed to it." He voted for it.

In consequence of an article in the Moniteur, the official journal of the French Government, the House on May 23 requested the President to communicate "any explanations given by the Government of the United States to the Government of France" respecting this resolution. President Lincoln in turn, on May 25, communicated to the House certain correspondence between Mr Seward, the Secretary of State, and Mr. Dayton, the minister to France (page 2475). France (page 2475).

Mr. Seward writes that the French minister having asked an explanation of the resolution, he inclosed it with the statement that it "truly interprets the uniform sentiment of the people of the United States in regard to Mexico." He says, however:

It is, however, another and distinct question whether the United States would think it necessary or proper to express themselves in the form adopted by the House of Representatives at this time. This is a practical and purely executive question, and a decision of it constitutionally belongs, not to the House of Representatives, nor even Congress, but to the President of the United States.

He further points out that a joint resolution must pass the Senate, etc., "before it can acquire the character of a legislative act;" and transmits the following message from President Lincoln:

and transmits the following message from President Lincoln:

He directs that you inform the Government of France that he does not at present contemplate any departure from the policy which this Government has hitherto pursued in regard to the war which exists between France and Mexico. It is hardly necessary to say that the proceedings of the House of Representatives were adopted by suggestions arising in itself and not upon any communication of the executive department, and that the French Government would be seasonably apprised of any change of policy upon this subject which the President might at any future time think it proper to adopt.

On December 15, 1864, Mr. Davis reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs the following resolution:

Resolved, That Congress has a constitutional right to an authoritative voice in declaring and prescribing the foreign policy of the United States as well in the recognition of new powers as in other matters, and it is the constitutional duty of the President to respect that policy not less in diplomatic negotiations than in the use of the national force when authorized by law; and the propriety of any declaration of foreign policy by Congress is sufficiently proved by the vote which pronounces it; and such proposition while pending and undetermined is not a fit topic of diplomatic explanation with any foreign power. (Page 48.)

This resolution

This resolution was the first attempt in our history to establish This resolution was the first attempt in our history to establish the doctrine that Congress had a paramount authority in foreign affairs. It was at first laid on the table. Mr. Davis thereupon asked to be relieved from further service on the Committee on Foreign Affairs. A debate ensued, in which most of the members participating took the side of Mr. Davis upon the constitutional question. The only member who opposed him was Mr. Blaine, who cited the declarations of Jefferson to Minister Genet (2 Randolph's Life of Jefferson, pages 158 and 159) and said (page 49):

To adopt this principle is to start out with a new theory in the administration of our foreign affairs, and I think the House has justified its sense of self-respect and its just appreciation of the spheres of the coordinate departments of Government by promptly laying the resolution on the table.

On December 19 the resolution was again offered, and amended by striking out the word "President" and inserting the words "executive departments." In this form it passed almost unanimously, Mr. Blaine not voting, the temper of the House evidently being much excited by some of the phraseology of Mr. Seward's dispatch. In view of the attitude of the Senate, Mr. Davis very wisely did not draw it in the form of a joint resolution.

PRETORIA RESOLUTION, 1876-77.

In 1876 the Republic of Pretoria (now the South African or Transvaal Republic) sent to Congress its congratulations upon the first centennial of our national independence. Mr. Swann, of Maryland, on December 15, 1876, reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 228) the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to communicate to the Republic of Pretoria the high appreciation by the House of Representatives of the complimentary terms in which said Republic has referred to the first centennial of our national independence in their resolutions to this House in May last.

On motion of Mr. Kasson, of Iowa, the resolution was amended so as to make it a joint resolution. It was then passed unanimously, no constitutional objection being raised; and a similar resolution was at the same time passed in relation to congratulations from the Argentine Republic. On January 11, 1877, the two resolutions were reported by Senator Simon Cameron, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Foreign Relations in the Senate, vania, from the Committee on Foreign Relations in the Senate, and passed unanimously without debate (page 568), except that Mr. Edmunds inquired as to the situation of the Republic of Pretoria, which Mr. Cameron was unable to describe, as he had "never heard of it until recently."

On January 26, 1877, President Grant vetoed the resolutions on constitutional grounds (page 1112). His veto message was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and never reported therefrom. The President said:

therefrom. The President said:

Sympathizing as I do in the spirit of courtesy and friendly recognition which has prompted the passage of these resolutions, I can not escape the conviction that their adoption has inadvertently involved the exercise of a power which infringes upon the constitutional rights of the Executive.

* * The Constitution of the United States, following the established usage of nations, has indicated the President as the agent to represent the national sovereignty in its intercourse with foreign powers, and to receive all official communications from them, * * * making him, in the language of one of the most eminent writers on constitutional law, "the constitutional organ of communication with foreign states." * * * If Congress can direct the correspondence of the Secretary of State with foreign governments, a case very different from that now under consideration might arise when that officer might be directed to present to the same foreign government entirely different and antagonistic views or statements.

RELATION OF THE UNITED STATES TO THE SOUTH AMERICAN STATES.

RELATION OF THE UNITED STATES TO THE SOUTH AMERICAN STATES.

In 1808 Charles IV of Spain transferred to Napoleon, by the treaty of Bayonne, all his right and titles to the Throne of Spain and the Indies, which included the colonies of South America. Self-government was thus forced upon the colonies, as they were determined to resist the French. (2 Lyman's Diplomacy of the United States, second edition, 408-431.) France was resisted by the juntas of South America in the name of Ferdinand VII, son of the King, whom Bonaparte had compelled to abdicate.

The real impulse to independence came from the refusal of the Regency of Cadiz to recognize the South American juntas. colonists saw that the Spaniards were resolved to keep them in absolute subjection, and the idea of independence gradually gained ground all over South America. When the European struggle was over and Spain had been freed from the French, the colonies were punished for having acted independently. (European Colonies, Payne, 234.)

PROGRESS TOWARD THE ACHIEVEMENT OF INDEPENDENCE PRIOR TO RECOGNITION IN 1822.

Venezuela.

Venezuela was the first to send agents to the United States.* These were John Vincente Bolivar and Talesfero Orca, who were furnished with credentials dated Caracas, April 25, 1810, and comfurnished with credentials dated Caracas, April 25, 1810, and competent powers to transact business. (Lyman, 425: Papers relative to revolted Spanish colonies, manuscript, Department of State.) A copy of the declaration of independence made by the provinces of Venezuela was communicated to this Government by the congress composed of deputies from those provinces assembled at Caracas, and was transmitted to Congress December 9, 1811. (Annals of Congress, Twelfth Congress, Part I, page 335.)

The two agents mentioned had no official intercourse with the Government, and the restoration of the royal authority in their country shortly after their arrival put an end to their diplomatic character. (Lyman, 425; foot note.)+

(Lyman, 425; foot note.)+

*The principal inhabitants of Caracas ever since the abdication meditated the formation of a provisional government on the model of the juntas of Spain. In 1810, when Napoleon's victory appeared complete, they, in the name of Ferdinand VII, deposed the Spanish colonial officers and elected a supreme junta. Other similar juntas were soon established in New Granada, Santa Fe, Quito, Carthagena, etc. They were opposed by the Regency of Cadiz. A congress of all the provinces of Venezuela met at Caracas and published a declaration of independence July 5, 1811. (European Colonies, Payne, 23° and 238.)

†In 1812 an earthquake destroyed the capital and 20,000 inhabitants. The colonial troops were smitten with despair. Miranda capitulated and Venezuela fell again into the hands of the Royalists. At this time (June, 1812) Congress, on Calhoun's motion, appropriated $50,000 for the sufferers at Caracas.

December 11, 1818, Mr. Clemente informed the Secretary of State that he had been appointed Venezuela's representative "near the United States," and requested an interview.

He was informed that on account of certain misconduct of his,

He was informed that on account of certain misconduct of his, no conference could be held with him and no communication received from him.* His correspondence was submitted to the Honse of Representatives with message of January 29, 1819. The report of Mr. J. Q. Adams, Secretary of State, which accompanies this message, gives the reasons in full for delaying recognition at this time. (IV American State Papers, Foreign Relations, 412-417.)

First Federal Republic of Colombia.

This was composed of the provinces of New Granada and Venezuela, together with the Presidency of Quito. The convention was held in Cocuta in 1821, and the union of the countries was decreed under the above title.

Bolivar became President, and he completed their liberation, the second decisive victory of Carabobo, in 1822, finally securing Colombian freedom. The Spanish commander capitulated Decem-ber 23, 1823, at Puerto Cabello. (European Colonies, Payne, 241.)

Buenos Ayres

The Province of Buenos Ayres made a formal declaration of independence July 9, 1816.† This declaration was made by the representatives of the United Provinces of Rio de la Plata in general congress assembled in the city of Tucuman, and was communicated to this Government by Don Manuel H. de Aguirre, who came hither as a public agent from La Plata and a private one

He addressed several letters to the Secretary of State in 1817 and 1818, soliciting the acknowledgment of the Provinces of Buenos Ayres, formerly the vice royalty of La Plata.

No answers were given to those letters, though conferences were eld with him. The President declined to enter into any arrange-No answers were given to those letters, though conferences were held with him. The President declined to enter into any arrangements with this individual, for he did not appear furnished with powers to negotiate, and the independence of the provinces was far from being established at that period, several portions of it being in possession of the Spaniards, Montevideo of the Portuguese, and the eastern shore under the government of General Artigas, who, though independent of the mother country, still maintained his independence of the Provinces of Buenos Ayres. (Lyman, 425.)

short time after the declination of Aguirre's application, David C. De Forrest renewed the consideration of the same claim in May, 1818, by soliciting of this Government to be admitted as a consul-general.

a consul-general.

The President did not grant the permission, because it was not clear that the province even claimed an entire independence, Buenos Ayres having the intention at that time to offer special commercial favors to Spain as a consideration for the relinquishment of her claims to sovereignty

The reservation of "an indefinite right to grant hereafter special favors to Spain for the remuneration of her claims of sovereignty left it uncertain whether the independence of Buenos Ayres would be complete or imperfect. * * * While the supreme director (Puerreydon) was insisting upon this reservation, a mediation between Spain and her colonies had been solicited by Spain and agreed to by the five principal powers of Europe, the basis of which was understood to be a compromise between the Spanish claim to sovereignty and the colonial claim to independence. The following extracts from the diary of Mr. John Quincy Adams relate to the attitude of the Executive Government in 1818 and 1819 toward the Spanish American provinces and especially toward Buenos Ayres. (Memoirs of John Quincy Adams, Charles Francis Adams.)

"January 13, 1818.—Mr. Adams speaks of the President's message to the two Houses sent in that day, relating to Amelia Island, South America, and Spain. Speaking of Clay's system of opposition to the Administration, he mentions a conversation with Crawford, showing that Clay was anxious to avoid collision if possible and proposed to make merely an appropriation for a minister to Buenos Ayres. On the same day Mr. Adams had a long conversation with Mr. Agnirre who preed answers to his demand for the tion with Mr. Aguirre, who urged answers to his demand for the acknowledgment of the Government of Buenos Ayres." (Volume IV, page 40.)

"July 25, 1818.—The President gave Mr. Adams two letters to read in confidence. One was from Judge Bland at Buenos Ayres to J. S. Skinner, the postmaster at Baltimore. It contains much information concerning the state of the country, a decided opinion that they will never again submit to the dominion of Spain, and an opinion equally strong that the Government of the United States ought not at present to recognize that of Buenos Ayres. Adams asked the President whether the other two commissioners entertained the same opinion as Judge Bland. He said he did not know. Adams said much would depend upon that, as Congress would doubtless look to their report particularly with a view to the ques-tion whether Buenos Ayres was to be acknowledged or not. The President said the commissioners would only state facts and give no opinion of their own. Adams said that would be very well if would state all the facts, but many of those stated by Judge Bland, and precisely those upon which the President had made up his opinion, were of a nature not to be officially and publicly stated, and yet if they were suppressed it would be impossible to give a view of the state of things upon which any reliance could be based. The President showed some little impatience of manner at these remarks and passed to another subject." (Id., pages 117 and 118.)

"July 28 .- Calhoun informs Adams that Rodney is of a different opinion from Bland, and so is Brackinridge, the secretary to the commissioners; and although no report has yet been made to the Government, Rodney and Brackinridge are filling the newspapers with publications to operate upon public opinion in favor of recognition." (Id., page 119).

"November 2 .--Adams mentions the displeasure of the President in learning that the late commissioners to South America-Rodney, Bland, and Graham—are so far from agreeing in the report they are to make that probably no two of them will agree upon the same. They will make their reports separately. The Presi-dent hinted that Rodney was under the influence of Brackinridge, who was a mere enthusiast, and that his report would be purposely adapted to the views of Clay and the opposition rather than posety adapted to the views of Clay and the opposition rather than to the views of the Administration." (Id., page 156).

"November 4.—Adams speaks again of the lack of harmony among the commissioners." (Id., page 159.)

"November 6.—Cabinet discussed the propriety of laying before Congress an argument to prove the inexpediency, for the present, of a public acknowledgment of the Spanish American governments." of a public acknowledgment of the Spanish American governments. Crawford thought the reports of the commissioners should be communicated to Congress and the reasons stated by the Executive for still postponing the acknowledgment of the revolutionary governments. Mr. Adams thought there was no objection in the President stating to Congress that he did not contemplate any departure from the impartial neutrality hitherto observed in the contest, and referring to the message at the commencement of the last session, he observed that the communication to Congress of the reports of the commissioners after their return naturally followed from the manner in which their mission was mentioned therein; and although Mr. Rodney's report was a permentioned therein; and although Mr. Rodney's report was a per-petual argument in favor of the recognition of Buenos Ayres, yet the facts disclosed in it, as well as the opinions of the other commissioners, afford ample reason for postponing its acknowledgment. Another reason for postponement was the mediation undertaken by the European allies between Spain and South America then in operation, which must certainly fail. That it was our true policy to let this expedient have its full effect, and after its failure we would be at perfect liberty to recognize any of the South American governments without coming in collision with the allies. Another reason for not acknowledging them at present was that though the Government of Buenos Ayres pretended to the sovereignty of the whole viceroyalty of the La Plata, yet Portugal was in possession of Montevideo, Artigas of the Banda Oriental, Paraguay under separate government, and the Spanish Royalists in five other provinces." (Id., pages 165 to 168.)
"December 14.—Adams told Mr. De Forrest, who came the preceding May with an application to be recognized as consul-general from the Provinces of South America, and who had recently renewed the application, that the President considered it would be a formal recognition of the Government of Buenos Ayres to issue to him an exequatur; that the President thought the time had not yet arrived when that recognition ought to take place, having in view both their interests and our own; that the Government was using their influence to produce a simultaneous acknowledgment of Buenos Ayres by other powers as well as by the United States; and that when the proper time should come the acknowledgment would not be withheld." (Id., page 190.) "January 1, 1819.—Read to the President draft of his dispatch to Richard Rush, announcing it as the President's intention at no remote period to recognize the Government of Buenos Ayres. Crawford and Wirt were startled; Adams added that he had always considered and declared the question of acknowledging the South American Governments as a question of time; that besides the return of our commissioners other great changes had occurred in that question since last year; the time itself that had elapsed had given additional proof of the stability of the Government of Buenos Ayres; the victory of Maipu had strongly confirmed their capacity to maintain their independence. Mr. Crawford thought 'Government hardly existed there at that time. The Buenos Ayres junta was powerless outside the town, and the country was fast lapsing into the utmost disorder and confusion. (European Colonies, Payne, 258.) In 1820 the tederal system collapsed. Artigas led the revolt in the Banda Oriental, and the Riverine provinces soon followed the example. (Id.)

if the acknowledgment was to take place it should be done, not by granting an exequatur to a consul, but by sending a minister there, because the Senate must then act upon the nomination, which would give their sanction to the measure. Mr. Wirt added that the House of Representatives must also concur by assenting to an act of appropriation. The President, laughing, said that as those bodies had the power of impeachment over us it would be quite convenient to have them thus pledged beforehand. Adams took a different view. He thought it not consistent with our national dignity to be the first in sending a minister to a new power. It had not been done by any European power to ourselves. If an exchange of ministers was to take place the first should come from them. Instead of admitting the Senate or House to any share in the act of recognition, Adams would expressly avoid that form of doing it which would require the concurrence of those bodies. 'It was, I had no doubt, by our Constitution, an act of the executive authority. General Washington had exercised it in recognizing the French General Washington had exercised it in recognizing the French Republic by the reception of Mr. Genet. Mr. Madison had exercised it by declining several years to receive and by finally receiving Mr. Onis; and in this instance I thought the Executive ought carefully to preserve entire the authority given him by the Constitution and not weaken it by setting the precedent of making either House of Congress a party to an act which it was his exclusive right and duty to perform. Mr. Crawford admitted that the recognition was strictly within the powers of the Executive alone."

In reference to our recognition of the independence of Buenos Ayres, Mr. John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State, wrote to President Monroe, under date of August 24, 1818:

Ayres, Mr. John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State, wrote to President Monroe, under date of August 24, 1818:

In the draft of a letter to Mr. Aguirre * * * I have stated to him the grounds upon which the Government of the United States have been deterred from an acknowledgment of that of Buenos Ayres as including the dominion of the whole viceroyalty of the La Plata. The result of the late campaign in Venezuela, by comparing the royal and the republican bulletins, has been so far disadvantageous to the latter that they have undoubtedly failed in obtaining possession of any part of the coast. They have, therefore, at least one more campaign to contest, to go through, for which they will need several months of preparation. Bolivar appears to have resigned the chief military command to Paez, and the army is to be reorganized. But the royalists do not appear to have gained any ground, and are evidently too much weakened by their losses to act upon the offensive. In this state the independence of Venezuela can scarcely be considered in a condition to claim the recognition of neutral powers. But there is a stage in such contests when the parties struggling for independence have, as I conceive, a right to demand its acknowledgment by neutral parties, and when the acknowledgment may be granted without departure from the obligations of neutrality. It is the stage when independence is established as a matter of fact, so as to leave the chances of the opposite party to recover their dominion utterly desperate. The neutral nation must, of course, judge for itself when this period has arrived; and as the belligerent nation has the same right to judge for itself, it is very likely to judge differently from the neutral and to make it a cause or pretext for war, as Great Britain did expressly against France in our Revolution and substantially against Holland. If war thus results in point of fact from the measure of recognizing a contested independence, the moral right or wrong of the war depends upon the justice and sincerity a

No revolutionary movement took place in Peru before 1819-20, the landed proprietors, slaveholders, being fearful that a change of government would result in a loss of their property, and that the contest might end as that of St. Domingo ended. The Peruvians even sent an army into Chile in 1813 to reestablish the royalist government. General San Martin, a distinguished character, with an army from Buenos Ayres, drove out the Peruvians in 1821, took Lima and afterwards Callao, the only places remaining in the possession of the King's forces. Peru's independence was proclaimed July 5, 1821. (2 Lyman.)

Chile. The first symptoms of revolution appeared in September, 1810. At a meeting of the junta in that year several parties were found to exist. One desired absolute independence, another favored compromise. Civil strife broke out, and the Royalists won a decisive battle in October, 1814, but in February, 1816, "the patriots" regained Chile by the help of General San Martin and 2,000 free negroes from Buenos Ayres. O'Higgins was made supreme director, who declared independence January 1, 1818.* (2 Lyman.)

Attitude of the United States prior to 1822. Mr. Lyman says that these revolutionary struggles did not awaken any great general interest in our citizens. Our Government was "left free and unembarrassed to pursue its steady course of good faith and exact neutrality toward Spain and of justice and policy toward the colonies." He says: "Neither the vicinity of some portions of their respective territories, nor the circumstance of being members of the same continent, nor the benefit to be derived from commercial relations, nor the similarity of their struggles for independence, appear in the least to have influenced the definite arrangements of this Government. On the contrary, the business was conducted with the utmost caution and circumspection, and nothing done to give offense to Spain or awaken in other nations the slightest suspicion of the loyalty with which this country was determined to adhere to its system of neutrality." (423, 424.)

SPECIAL COMMISSIONERS OF THE UNITED STATES TO SOUTH AMERICA. Between 1810 and 1820 the President sent commissioners on three different occasions to South America in order to obtain just and precise notions of the real situation of affairs there

First commission.

The instruction of Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, to Mr. Joel Poinsett, "agent to Buenos Ayres," is dated June 28, 1810, and is found in British and Foreign State Papers, volume 1, pages 1219 and 1220. His instruction to Mr. Alexander Scott, "agent to Venezuela," is dated May 14, 1812. (Ibid., 1220–1222; see also Report No. 72, House of Representatives, Twentieth Congress, second session, 1829.) Mr. Poinsett's report on the condition of South America, dated November 4, 1818, is contained in American State Papers, Foreign Relations, Volume IV, pages 323–348.

Second commission.

Some progress having been made by several of the Spanish American provinces toward independence, and the representa-tions of the colonial agents not being satisfactory, the President, in 1817, sent Mr. Theodorick Bland, Mr. Cæsar A. Rodney, and Mr. John Graham to examine into the condition of Buenos Avres and Chile.

and Chile.

Mr. Rodney's report, dated November 5, 1818, is in American State Papers, Foreign Relations, Volume IV, pages 217–224; Mr. Graham's, of the same date, follows on pages 224–227. Appended to these reports is an "Historical sketch of the revolution of the United Provinces of South America from the 25th of May, 1810, until the opening of the national congress on the 25th of March, 1816. Written by Dr. Gregorio Funes, and appended to his history of Buenos Ayres, Paraguay, and Tucuman." (228–245.) Notwithstanding the title, the account comes down to April, 1818. There are also other documents attached to these reports—a manifesto directed to all nations by the General Constituent Congress. There are also other documents attached to these reports—a manifesto directed to all nations by the General Constituent Congress of the United Provinces of Rio de la Plata; notes prepared by the Secretary of State in the department of foreign relations for the information of the President of the United States and placed in the hands of our deputies, etc. (See pages 245–270.) Mr. Bland's separate report, dated November 2, 1818, appears on pages 270–212, and is followed by appendices. 312, and is followed by appendices.

These reports were communicated to Congress November 17 and December 15, 1818.

Third commission.

In 1820 Mr. T. B. Prevost and Mr. John M. Forbes were sent as agents for commerce for Chile and Buenos Ayres.

Their reports were communicated to Congress March 8 and April 26, 1822, and are contained in American State Papers, Foreign Relations, Volume IV, pages 818 and 854.

PRESIDENT MONROE'S MESSAGE OF MARCH 8, 1822, RECOGNIZING THE INDE-PENDENCE OF THE SPANISH-AMERICAN COLONIES.

In replying to the resolution of the House of Representatives of January 30, 1822, asking for the reports of our agents to the Governments south of the United States which had declared their independence, the President mentioned the following facts as to their condition:

their condition:

Buenos Ayres assumed that rank (of an independent nation) by a formal declaration in 1816, and had enjoyed it since 1810 free from invasion by the parent country.

The provinces composing the Republic of Colombia, after having separately declared their independence, were united by a fundamental law of the 17th of December, 1819.

A strong Spanish force occupied at that time certain parts of the territory within their limits, and waged a destructive war; that force has since been repeatedly defeated, and the whole of it either made prisoners or destroyed, or expelled from the country, with the exception of an inconsiderable portion only, which is blockaded in two fortresses. * * * * Chile declared independence in 1818, and has since enjoyed it undisturbed; and of late, by the assistance of Chile and Buenos Ayres, the revolution has extended to Peru. * * * tis distinctly understood that the new Government (of Mexico) has declared its independence, and that there is no opposition to it there nor a force to make any. For the last three years the Government of Spain has not sent a single corps of troops to any part of that country; nor is there any reason to believe it will send any in future.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES MARCH 19, 1822.

They reported that the President's message of March 8, and the documents accompanying it, having been referred to them, they had examined them with "profound attention" and "unanimously" reported the following facts:

mously" reported the following facts:

That the provinces of Buenos Ayres, after having, from the year 1810, proceeded in their revolutionary movements without any obstacle from the Government of Spain, formally declared their independence of that Government in 1816. After various intestine commotions and external collisions, those provinces now enjoy domestic tranquillity and a good understanding with all their neighbors, and actually exercise, without opposition from within or the fear of annoyance from without, all the attributes of sovereignty. of sovereignty.

The provinces of Venezuela and New Granada, after having separately declared their independence, sustained for a period of more than ten years a desolating war against the armies of Spain, and having severally attained, by their triumph over those armies, the object for which they contended, united themselves on the 19th of December, 1819, in one nation, under the title of the "Republic of Colombia."

The Republic of Colombia has now a well-organized Government, instituted by the free will of its citizens, and exercises all the functions of sovereignty, fearless alike of internal and foreign enemies. The small remnant of the numerous armies commissioned to preserve the suprement of the parent State is now missioned to preserve the supremacy of the parent State is now blockaded in two fortresses, where it is innoxious and where, deprived as it is of all hope of succor, it must soon surrender at discretion. When this event shall have occurred, there will not remain a vestige of foreign power in all that immense Republic, containing between three and four millions of inhabitants.

The province of Chile, since it declared its independence in the year 1818, has been in the constant and unmolested enjoyment of the sovereignty which it then assumed.

the sovereignty which it then assumed.

The province of Peru, situated, like Chile, beyond the Andes and bordering on the Pacific Ocean, was for a long time deterred from making any effectual effort for independence by the presence of an imposing military force which Spain had kept up in that country. It was not, therefore, until the 12th of June of the last year that its capital, the city of Lima, capitulated to an army chiefly composed of troops from Buenos Ayres and Chile, under the command of General San Martin. The greater part of the royal troops which escaped on that occasion retreated to the mountains, but soon left them to return to the coast, there to join the royal garrison in the fortress of Callao. The surrender of that fortress soon after to the Americans may be regarded as the termination of the war in that quarter. termination of the war in that quarter.

When the people of Peru found themselves by this event free to express their will, they most unequivocally expressed it in favor of independence and with a unanimity and enthusiasm which have nowhere been excelled.

The revolution in Mexico has been somewhat different in its character and progress from the revolutions in the other Spanish-American provinces, and its result in respect to the organization of its internal government has also not been precisely the same. Independence, however, has been as emphatically declared and as practically established since the 24th of August last by the "Mexican Empire" as ever it has been by the republics of the South, and her geographical situation, her population, and her resources eminently qualify her to maintain the independence which she has thus declared and now actually enjoys.

The committee declared that the people of Spanish America did notoriously govern themselves by their own authority and laws, and that the right of the United States to recognize the governments which they had instituted was incontestible.

The committee concluded their report with an expression of their unanimous opinion "that it is just and expedient to acknowledge the independence of the several nations of Spanish America, without any reference to the diversity in the forms of their govern-American provinces, and its result in respect to the organization of out any reference to the diversity in the forms of their governments," and they submitted two resolutions:

First. That the House "concur in the opinion expressed by the President in his message of the 8th of March, 1822, that the American provinces of Spain, which have declared their independence and are in the enjoyment of it, ought to be recognized by the United States as independent nations." This was passed in the House March 28, 1822, unanimously with the exception of one vote. (Annals of Congress.)

Second. That the Committee on Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill appropriating not exceeding $100,000 "to enable the President of the United States to give due effect to such recognition." (See debate thereon, Annals of Congress, Seventeenth Congress, first session, Volume II, pages 1382 et seq.).*

PRESIDENT MONROE'S MESSAGE TO THE SENATE, APRIL 26, 1822

On April 25 the Senate requested the President for information "from our minister at Madrid or from the Spanish minister resident in this country concerning the views of Spain relative to the recognition of the independence of the South American colonies." Replying on the next day, the President transmitted the Spanish minister's protest, dated March 9, 1822.

The minister, Don Joaquin de Anduaga, expressed surprise at the President's message of March 8, which he had seen in the National Intelligencer. He declared that Buenos Ayres was sunk in the most conclude anorthy a new decree terrains.

in the most complete anarchy, a new despot appearing each day; that Peru, conquered by a rebel army, had near the gates of its capital another Spanish army, aided by part of the inhabitants; that in Chile an individual suppressed the sentiments of the inhabitants, and his violence presaged a sudden change; that on the coast itants, and his violence presaged a sudden change; that on the coast of Fernia the Spanish banners waved, and the insurgent generals were occupied in quarreling with their compatriots; that in Mexico there was no government. He inquired: "Where, then, are those governments which ought to be recognized; where the pledges of their stability; where the proof that these provinces will not return to a union with Spain, when so many of their inhabitants desire it; and, in fine, where the right of the United States to sanction and declare legitimate a rebellion without cause, and the event of which is not even decided?" (IV American State Papers, Foreign Relations, 845, 846.)

which is not even decided?" (IV American State Papers, Foreign Relations, 845, 846.)

The reply of Mr. J. Q. Adams, Secretary of State, dated April 6, 1822, was also transmitted.

Mr. Adams asserted that "the civil war in which Spain was for some years involved with the inhabitants of her colonies in America has, in substance, ceased to exist. Treaties equivalent America has, in substance, ceased to exist. Treaties equivalent to an acknowledgment of independence have been concluded by the commanders and viceroys of Spain herself with the Republic of Colombia, with Mexico, and with Peru; while in the provinces of La Plata and Chile no Spanish force has for several years existed to dispute the independence which the inhabitants of those countries had declared."

He refused to discuss the details of facts "upon which your information appears to be materially different from that which has been communicated to this Government." (IV American State Papers, Foreign Relations, 345, 346.)

The Senate does not appear to have discussed the message and reports, but passed the appropriation bill after a short debate on April 29, 1822.

Mr. Lyman says (Volume II, page 447) that the recognition by this country was the first, but it was delayed till not a shadow of hope for the restoration of Spanish dominion remained. The last strand had fairly parted, and it had fully ceased to be matter of doubt whether injury was done to Spain.

Under the leadership of Mr. Clay, the House of Representatives endeavored, on several occasions between 1818 and 1822, to recognize or procure the recognition of the independence of the South American provinces.

On March 25, 1818, Mr. Clay offered an amendment to the appro-On March 25, 1818, Mr. Clay offered an amendment to the appropriation bill providing for one year's salary and an outfit for a minister to the United Provinces of Rio de la Plata, the salary to commence and the outfit to be paid whenever the President shall deem it expedient to send a minister to the said provinces.

Mr. Clay said, in support of this amendment, that from the peculiar character of the American Government there was great reason for there being a perfect understanding between the legislative and the executive branches in relation to the acknowledgment of a new power. Everywhere else the power of declaring war rested with the executive; here it was deposited with the legiislative. If there was even a risk that the acknowledgment of the new State might lead to war, it was advisable that the step should new State might lead to war, it was advisable that the step should not be taken without a previous knowledge of the will of the war-making branch. He wished to give to the President all the confidence which he must derive from an unequivocal expression of the will of Congress. He was aware that this expression might be given in the form of an abstract resolution declaratory of that will, but he preferred proposing an act of practical legislation.

Mr. Forsyth, in opposition to Mr. Clay, not only mentioned the absurdity of this method of acknowledging the independence of those provinces as following it would not be acknowledging their independence, but asking them to acknowledge ours, but presented also this objection:

also this objection:

Heretofore the President and Senate, were left to the exclusive management of the foreign intercourse of the United States. Ministers were received from other powers and sent from this country to other countries with whom political or commercial interest required us to negotiate, and the House of Representatives contented itself with its constitutional check upon the exercise of this authority, satisfied that they could at all times prevent its improvident exertion by withholding appropriations from those missions the public interest did not require. This, however, proposes a new system; this House, instead of checking, is made to stimulate the executive to a further extension of its patronage. * * * The suggestion that under the present extraordinary circumstances of the war the expression of the public opinion by the representatives of the people ought to precede the movements of the Executive was not entitled to the weight which was given to it. The President does not require to be told that the representatives of the people who selected him to preside over their Government are prepared at all times and at every hazard to do their duty * * *

Mr. Forsyth added:

If our interference is necessary, let us act effectively, marking the steps necessary to be taken and taking the responsibility for the result—claiming all the honor and bearing all the disaster. Let us not at least pretend to give the Executive a discretion already possessed, thus diminishing his responsibility without adding to our own. (Benton's Abridgment of the Debates of Congress, Volume VI, pages 145 and 146.)

Mr. A. Smyth, of Virginia, said, on March 27, in opposing Mr. Clay's motion:

Clay's motion:

The Constitution grants to the President, by and with the consent of the Senate, power to appoint ambassadors and public ministers and to make treaties. According to the usage of the Government, it is the President who receives all foreign ministers and determines what foreign minister shall or shall not be received. It is by the exercise of some one of these powers, in neither of which has this House any participation, that a foreign power must be acknowledged. Thus the acknowledgment of the independence of a new power is an exercise of executive authority; consequently, for Congress to direct the Executive how he shall exercise this power is an act of usurpation.

* * * It is for the executive branch of the Government to decide to whom and when a public minister shall be sent. * * * You possess the power of impeachment, and consequently may discuss and by resolution express an opinion on any past act either of the executive or of the judiciary, but you have no right to give a direction to either. The President is responsible for the proper execution of his constitutional powers; he may be punished for abusing them or for neglect of his duty. This House is the proper body to prosecute him if he shall fail to do his duty. We are not in like manner responsible and punishable. If we direct the President to do an act, however injurious to the nation it may prove, we can not make him responsible. Is it proper thus to deprive the people of the security which they have reserved to themselves in the President's constitutional responsibility? (Id., 162.)

Mr. Robertson, of Louisiana, said it could not be otherwise than

Mr. Robertson, of Louisiana, said it could not be otherwise than agreeable to the President to know the opinion of Congress on so momentous a subject. If that opinion, independently expressed, shall concur with his own, he will act conformably to it; on the other hand, if, from the position he occupies in the Government, from his better information, or from any other circumstances unknown to the public, he shall think it best to continue unchanged the state of our relations with South America, he will do so. nals of Congress, Fifteenth Congress, first session, Volume II,

Mr. Smith, of Maryland, considered the course of conduct on the part of Congress in this case novel and wholly unprecedented.

the part of Congress in this case novel and wholly unprecedented. The Constitution has given to Congress legislative powers; to the President the direction of our intercourse with foreign nations. It is not wise for us to interfere with his powers. His plans may be digested with wisdom; our interference might destroy them, and perhaps at the moment when they would otherwise have succeeded. * * We are told by Mr. Robertson that we should pursue the course of conduct adopted by General Washington with the French Republic. Did Congress on that occasion direct the conduct of General Washington? Did that Congress tell him that he did not understand what he ought to do and that they would instruct him? No, sir: they left him to exercise the powers vested in him by the Constitution; to the exercise of his own judgment. They sustained him by no act. Let us act in like manner by the present Chief Magistrate. He has not asked for our assistance. He has asked no outfit for a minister to La Plata: when he does it will be time to consider the subject. (Id., pages 1538 and 1539).

Mr. Nelson of Virginia expressed views similar to Mr. Smith's.

Mr. Clay rejoined on the 28th. He contended that though the administration of the foreign concerns of the country was confided to the executive branch, the House also had a participation fided to the executive branch, the House also had a participation in such matters when called upon to defray the expenses of foreign missions or to regulate commerce; that the Constitution did not say which should have precedence, the act of making the appropriation for paying a minister or the sending of one. He contended that they should either be simultaneous, or if either had the preference the appropriation should precede the sending. He quoted several instances where this had been done. The act authorizing the establishment of certain consulates in the Mediterranean and affixing salaries thereto, in consequence of which the President affixing salaries thereto, in consequence of which the President had subsequently appointed consuls. He maintained that each department of the Government must act within its own sphere department of the Government must act within its own sphere independently and on its own responsibility. He was willing to say to the President, "Here is the money which we alone have the right to appropriate which will enable you to carry your power into effect if it seems expedient to you." Congress had authorized appropriations without any official call from the Executive to do so in two recent acts, Volume III of the Laws, page 27, to defray the expense of such treaties as the President might deep proper. the expense of such treaties as the President might deem proper to make with certain Indian tribes, and as he believed, in the case of the two millions appropriated for the purchase of the Floridas. (Id., page 1607.)

Mr. Poindexter, of Mississippi, made the point (page 1630) that the amendment proposed to vest the President alone with author-ity to send a minister. If the object was to place the money at his disposal it could be done by simply making that addition to his disposal it could be done by simply making that addition to the contingent fund, in which case it could be expended or not, according to the exigencies which might arise, but if it was intended to clothe the President alone with power to appoint a foreign minister, it was manifestly unconstitutional. The Presi-dent needed no legislation to enlarge his powers whenever he deemed it expedient to send ambassadors to foreign countries. No such appointment can be made without the concurrence of the Senate, and if they approve it the salary and outfit are already provided for by a general law, and needs not the aid of a special appropriation. The proposition then was nugatory unless considered directory of the President on a point of duty devolved on him by the Constitution. It was an indirect censure. Foreign nations by the Constitution. It was an indirect censure. Foreign nations and perhaps our own citizens would imbibe that impression, and the Chief Magistrate would be considered as having incurred the frowns of the representatives of the people, whose interposition had become necessary to urge that high officer to a faithful discharge of the trust imposed in him by his countrymen.

Mr. Poindexter called attention to the communication at the beginning of the session of the views of the President contains.

beginning of the session of the views of the President contained in his message on the subject of internal improvements and stat-ing that the power to construct roads and canals within the respective States was not possessed by Congress, and that he would feel bound to withhold his signature from any bill which might be passed establishing a general system of internal immight be passed establishing a general system of internal improvements. Mr. Clay at that time condemned this peremptory expression of executive opinion as an unwarrantable encroachment upon the freedom of legislation and the privileges of the House of Representatives, to whom the right of originating all laws was given by the Constitution. It was urged that though the President was an integral branch of the legislature, he should have reserved his objections until he was called on to act in the regular constitutional order of proceeding. Mr. Poindexter insisted that it equally belonged to the President to originate foreign missions and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint ambassadors and other public ministers, yet Senate to appoint ambassadors and other public ministers, yet Mr. Clay claimed for the House the coordinate right to institute a mission to the Rio de la Plata, and considered it no encroachment upon the powers delegated by the Constitution to the President and Senate.

On March 28 Mr. Forsyth said that all who had addressed the committee on the subject desired to recognize the independence of the southern countries whenever it could be done consistently with our own interests and safety.

The only difference between us is that we do not wish to precede the proper official organ of the nation in order to recognize the independence of these countries, and those in favor of the motion wish to do so. (Annals of Congress, March 28, 1818, page 1637.)

On the 30th of March, when Mr. Clay's amendment was under reconsideration, having been voted down, Mr. Anderson, of Ken-tucky, renewed it in the Committee of the Whole House in order to take the yeas and nays. Mr. Spencer, of New York, said:

I believe most firmly that we have the constitutional power to legislate on this and every other subject connected with our foreign relations or with the regulation of commerce. I hold it to be a power concurrent with that of the executive branch, and believing it to be one of the most important which this House possesses, I would make a perpetual claim to the right on every proper occasion, and I would place it on the records of the nation as an eternal evidence of that claim. (Id., 1654.)

Mr. Clay declared that his amendment, if adopted, would impose no obligation on the President, but put in his power to apply the same to the purpose specified whenever he chose to do so, if the Senate consented. (Annals of Congress, Fifteenth Congress, first session, volume 2, page 1645.) It was defeated 115 to 45 (Id., 1646), and again defeated by the same vote on reconsideration (Id., 1655). February 5, 1821.—Mr. Clay moved an amendment to the general appropriation bill in order to provide "for an outfit and one year's salary to such minister as the President by and with the advice of the Senate may send to any government of South America which has established and is maintaining its independency of Spain." (7 Benton's Debates of Congress, 93.) This is very similar to the amendment proposed by Mr. Clay March 25. ency of Spain." (7 Benton's Debates of Congress, 93.) This is very similar to the amendment proposed by Mr. Clay March 25, 1818 (6 Benton's Debates of Congress, 145), which was voted down after long discussion. It in turn was rejected by a vote of 77 to (Page 94.)

February 10 Mr. Clay submitted the following resolution:

That the House of Representatives participates with the people of the United States in the deep interest which they feel for the success of the Spanish provinces of South America which are struggling to establish their liberty and inflependence; and that it will give its constitutional support to the President of the United States whenever he may deem it expedient to recognize the sovereignty and independence of any of the said provinces (page 95).

Objected to by Mr. Wood:

1. It made needless professions, and not therefore consistent with self-respect.

2. If it had any object it was an encroachment on the power of the executive and might produce collision between the two departments of Government, which was much to be deprecated.

Favored by Mr. Floyd, who referred to an early message of Washington to Congress to show that at that time the previous consent of Congress was thought necessary to the institution of foreign missions Thence and from other considerations this resolution, so far from interfering with the executive prerogative, was a fair exercise of the undoubted rights of the House.

Also, it was expedient as tending to counteract the policy of the Holy Alliance.

Mr. Archer required a division of the question, so as to take the first vote on the first member of the resolution.

Mr. Robertson deprecated the passage of the whole resolution.

It was intended to goad the executive into a departure from its hitherto wise policy on this subject. He was decidedly opposed to it.

Mr. Montgomery adopted the view of Mr. Robertson and was not convinced that the people took a deep interest in the matter.

Mr. Tyler and Mr. Walker favored both members of the reso-Intion

Mr. Mercer gave reasons for his support; doubted whether the President could recognize the independence of a foreign state by receiving a minister without the consent of the House.

Mr. Clagett, believing that the power of recognition was confided to another branch of the Government both competent and dis-posed to exercise it when proper, and for other reasons assigned, was opposed to the resolution.

Mr. Cobb considered sound policy against the second portion of the resolution, and there was no occasion for passing it

Mr. Baldwin objected because it proposed to refer to the President an act which not he, but all three branches of the Government collectively, should perform.

Mr. Maclay opposed because the subject had been long before the executive and much deliberated upon, and the House, passing such a resolution, ought to be possessed of full information on the subject—of all which the executive possessed and by which its course had been influenced—that they might judge whether that department had or had not performed its duty. Believing it had done so and would hereafter do so, he was against the resolution.

Mr. Stevens defended the constitutional right of the House to corress its opinion on any topic of public interest. This would not express its opinion on any topic of public interest. This would not interfere with the executive authority, but facilitate its exercise.

As to its being a goad to the Executive, there was no reason to believe that at this day he was to be driven from his course by any such measure.

Mr. Smith, of Maryland, opposed, because it attributed to the President the power of recognition, too important to be exercised by any authority less than the three branches of the Government; because it made the House, incompatibly with the Constitution, the adviser of the President; that it made a bad precedent, which might be used in future times, through the influence of the President, in the House; that it proposes that this House shall compromit its successors, which it could not do and which it was therefore improper to attempt to do.

Mr. Clay cited the precedent of the resolution of Congress to support the President in any consequences which might follow the dismission of Mr. Jackson, the British minister, some years before.

dismission of Mr. Jackson, the British minister, some years before. He ridiculed the argument that the resolution would encroach upon the authority of the Executive. On the contrary, it assumed only a fair responsibility, and added strength to the Executive. With respect to the mode of recognition of foreign powers, he said that both Congress and the Executive had this power, but that the most regular, ordinary, and usual course was by the Executive, and it was therefore proper to assure him of the support of this House. (Page 98.)

Mr. Sergeant, of Pennsylvania, opposed, among other reasons, because—

That it is not a legislative act and is not to lead to one.
 That it contains a declaration by which neither the House, the President, nor the Senate would be bound.

3. That it would involve the House in difficulties on constitu-

4. That if Congress wished a recognition, having the power equally with the Executive, they should effectuate their wish by a legislative act.

5. That if the House expressed its opinion, it should be done after due inquiry and examination of facts, none of which had been placed before it in anything like official shape.

6. That the House ought not to lose sight in acts of kindness and expressions of good will to other powers of the duty which it owed to this nation—to the interests of the people.

7. That general and vague oral information was not a sufficient ground for Congress to act upon, and that if official information was before it requiring it to act, its act should be something plainer than this and presenting on its face a direct proposition; that its not doing so caused it to be more lightly considered and voted upon than it ought to be.

8. That however independent of the Executive as an individual the House might be, yet with respect to the executive as a branch of the Government it was important for the House not to disturb the harmony of the different departments of Government as adjusted by the Constitution itself, and that it should not rush from its sphere and jostle the others in its course. (Pages 98 and 99.)

The first member of the resolution was carried, 134 to 12; second member, 87 to 68. (Page 99.)

February 19, 1821.—Mr. Clay, from the committee to present the resolution of the 10th instant to the President, reported that the President assured the committee that in common with the people of the United States and the House of Representatives he felt great interest in the success of the provinces of Spanish America which are struggling to establish their freedom and independence, and that he would take the resolution into deliberate consideration, with the most perfect respect for the distinguished body from which it had emanated. (Page 124.)

January 31, 1822.—Mr. Trimble offered the following joint resolution:

Intion:

That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized and requested to acknowledge the independence of the Republic of Colombia, and by an interchange of accredited ministers to place the political relations of that Government with the United States on an equal footing with those of all other independent nations; that such of the Spanish provinces in South America as have established and are maintaining their independence of Span ought in like manner to be acknowledged by the United States as free, sovereign, and independent governments.

This was read twice and laid on the table, and ordered to be printed. (Annals of Congress, January 31, 1822, page 854.)

February 11, 1822.—Mr. Trimble's resolution was committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. (Annals of Congress, page 982.)

The views of the Executive are found recorded in a memorandum of Mr. Monroe, made while the question was under discussion in Congress. It is as follows:

The object of the Executive has been to throw the moral weight of the United States into the scale of the revolutionary movement without such a deep compromitment as to make them a party on that side.

With that view the mission to Buenos Ayres was adopted, all the messages to Congress were drawn, and other measures have been since pursued, particularly the mission of Commodores Perry and Morris to Venezuela and Buenos Ayres. With that view was the proposition made to Great Britain directly by Mr. Rush, and to France and Russia through their ministers in the United States, to recognize the colonies in concert with those powers, a proposition which it was thought would have the best effect in that respect—that is, by throwing our weight into that scale, and in a way to do no harm, as it would be a manifestation of respect for them, as well as of moderation on our part. With the same view has the correspondence with the present Spanish minister been conducted, as well as the message to Congress announcing it.

Spanish minister been conducted, as well as the message to consider standing it.

The object of the Executive has been to leave the affair where it was placed by the attitude assumed in that correspondence and message, to witness its effect on Spain and other powers before other measures should be taken.

It is believed that that attitude would have been perfectly safe, while it was undoubtedly very strong and imposing. The vote of the House of Representatives reenforces it, and, being not obligatory as a measure, ought not to be considered in any other light. It is hoped that it will not. On that side, it must be admitted, is the danger. (Mr. Monroe's note, without date, supposed to be 1820 or 1821, Monroe's writings, manuscript, Volume VI, 696.)

Mr. HOAR. It is true that the time for a full debate of this

Mr. HOAR. It is true that the time for a full debate of this matter, as the Senator from Maine has so well intimated, has not arrived. I do not understand that he has by any means said all that he will say before the debate is over upon this general question, but at the same time it is perhaps the first considerable discussion of the matter as it now stands with the pending resolution which will go out to the country, and what the two Senators today have said will attract attention in the press and from thoughtful students, and will make up public sentiment. Therefore, I wish to bring out very distinctly, if I can, by a question to the Senator from Maine, whether, in his researches into the history of this country for a hundred years, in which we must have recognized foreign governments more than a hundred times, taking all the numbers of the governments of the world and their political changes and revolutions which have established new govern-

Mr. HALE. Over a hundred. Mr. HOAR. There must be over a hundred cases, as the Sena-Mr. HOAR. Mr. HOAR. There must be over a numbered cases, as the second tor says. Is there a single instance where in fact our relations with the foreign country have not been determined by the act of recognition by the President of the United States and without Congress? Has there been a single one?

Mr. HALE. As the result of some considerable, and what I have tried to make faithful, examination of the subject and of what others have done for me, I answer the Senator from Massachusetts that I do not find one.

Mr. ALLEN. As this question is very important and going out to the country to be criticised, I ask the Senator from Maine whether he will not state to the Senate whether he finds any instance in the history of this country where the question of independency was determined to belong to the executive department exclusively?

Mr. HALE. In every one of the cases that have been referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar] the recognition was made by the executive department, acted upon, submitted to, and not questioned.

Mr. ALLEN. I think the Senator from Maine does not understand my question. I do not contend that the Chief Executive is not the instrument through which we must act in recognizing the existence of another government; but I do contend that there the existence of another government; but I do contend that there is not a precedent to the contrary in the history of this country—

Mr. HALE. The precedents are all the other way.
Mr. ALLEN. Wait a moment. I contend that the power to recognize is a power that must be exercised by the Executive after action upon the part of the Legislature.
Mr. HALE. If the Senator will examine the precedents, he will give up that contention, because he is capable of careful examination, he is a lawyer who knows the force of precedents and he will tion; he is a lawyer who knows the force of precedent; and he will find that in nineteen cases out of twenty the act of recognition has been by the President; that Congress has never lifted its voice or made a protest; and history has been made by the act of the Executive alone, and exclusively, except in a few cases, as in Jackson's action in the Texas case where, in his wisdom—I think it was wise—when Congress was in session, reserving all the rights of the Executive, declaring that he would not assert them, putting it upon the question of expediency alone, he did confer with Congress. All the instances of Congressional intervention in any way on this great subject came about in that way and have never crystallized themselves into the form of attempting to recognize a government as is attempted by the resolutions of the Committee on Foreign Relations or the resolutions of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will permit me—and I shall retire from the discussion after making this statement—I desire to state, and have it go in connection with the statement of the Senator from Maine, that there is not a syllable in the Constitution, from its opening to the closing of the amendments, nor in the history of the time when it was formed and promulgated, nor is there a thing in the genius and spirit of our republican form of government which lends any color in the slightest degree to the careful student or thoughtful man to hold that the Chief Executive has the exclusive power of recognizing the independence of a country. On the other hand, the very atmosphere of the time when the Constitution was formed, the very spirit of liberty that was breathed by our people, the very genius of our institutions, and the language of the Constitution as well as its policy as the known policy of this Government is against the conclusion urged by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not wish to prolong this de-bate this afternoon, as I expect to take some part in the discussion of the question hereafter; but I think I should like to make one observation before the matter passes from the discussion of the Senate to-day in connection with what has been said by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Allen].

It seems to me that it is utterly incredible that the framers of our Constitution should not have expected that the mere act of recognition, not as an incident to some other power, should not have been lodged in the President of the United States. I hold that it is, as everybody will agree, an incidental power, if it exists anywhere, to some authority conferred on some department of the Government. I agree and believe that it is an incidental power to the power to regulate commerce, which is lodged in Congress; to the power to regulate by law the action and conduct of our citizens in our foreign relations, which, where lawful, we are bound to stand by to the extent of going to war for their protection, if need be; and I hold that Congress, the lawmaking power, without the assent of the President where it is not necessary, where there is a two-thirds vote, or where he keeps a bill without his signature, may rightfully regulate the action of citizens of the United States in regard to the Island or the inhabitants of the Island of Cuba in a matter which must necessarily involve the determining for all American citizens the question whether that is or is not an independent nation.

Independent nation.

The existence of such a power in Congress is no more inconsistent with the existence of a like power in the President than the treaty-making power, lodged in the President with the assent of this body, which is a lawmaking power, is inconsistent with the ordinary legislative power. The last treaty abrogates all previous laws; the last law abrogates all previous treaties where they are inconsistent with each other. But with that reservation it seems to me utterly incredible that the mere power of recognition, of a stablishing the status of a foreign government in its relation to establishing the status of a foreign government in its relation to our citizens and as a government for their conduct, should be lodged anywhere else but in the President of the United States

It is a very important question if an American ship be in the Caribbean Sea and a Cuban vessel approach her, claiming that she is the representative of an independent power at war with Spain and has the right of search, whether that action of invasion of our ship is piracy or whether the resistance to that action is a violation of the law of nations, which is in itself an act in the nature of piracy, and perhaps literal piracy. I am not prepared to say how that is, and it is not necessary to say how that is at this moment. But suppose that Congress to-day passes this naked resolution to recognize Cuba and adjourns to-morrow, and day after to-morrow the Spanish army captures every insurgent in Cuba, reduces the island to absolute subjection, occupies every inch of its territory, and the Spanish law extends over it peacefully and quietly and without further resistance, is the President of the United States obliged to treat Cuba as an independent nation for ten months, or until we meet again in December? nation for ten months, or until we meet again in December? The mere power of determining whether a foreign nation is independent or not is a power which, in the nature of things, must be exercised from week to week and day to day, and sometimes even from hour to hour. It seems to me, with great deference, utterly preposterous to pretend that that is, can be, or ever could be by any sensible makers of the Constitution lodged in a legislative bedy, which conservation is assessed but three months cut of the body, which some years is in session but three months out of the twelve. That is the proposition of a naked resolution, which is to last not five minutes, but, if it has any power, is to last until the Congress that makes it repeals it. Now, add to that suggestion of the reason and the necessity of the case the further suggestion that for the one hundred and eight years since the Constitution went into actual operation-it is one hundred and ten years since it was formed-there has not been a single instance in all our history, though this very question of authority has come up again and again, where our relations with a foreign country, relations which settle the question whether a citizen of the United States, in the defense of his own vessel and of his own deck, is acting lawfully or is a pirate, have not been determined solely by the President of the United States; and never in a single instance has Congress exercised the power to do it, and never in a single instance has Congress asserted the power to do it, although you will find one or two reports in one or the other

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I have taken occasion to examine this question with some care and have listened with great interest to the suggestions concerning it made in this Chamber It does not seem to me at all necessary that it shall be held that of the Houses where some individual Senator or Representative power to recognize the independence of another nation is exclusive in its nature. The fact is that I have reached the con-clusion that it is not exclusive in either the Congress or the clusion that it is not exclusive in either the Congress or the Executive. It has been argued here by several Senators that the power of recognizing the independence of another country is incidental. That is true; clearly true. You do not find the question of the recognition of independence or belligerency treated in express terms in any part of the Federal Constitution. Therefore, when you come to find the authority you must locate it under some clause of the Constitution which does not refer to it directly. Make this search, and where do you find it? The power, it seems to me, is incidental to the power to make war and the power to regulate foreign commerce, both of which are vested in the President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives—that is, in the Congress. Again, it is clear to me that it is a power incidental to the making of treaties, which is vested in the President and the Senate. Nor do I feel any doubt that it is a power incidental to the reception of ambassadors, which is vested in the Senators who have examined this subject can not have failed to read the report of John Quincy Adams while Secretary of State. What does he say about it? He suggests that the proper method of recognizing the independence of another government is by treaty, and he calls attention to the fact that the recognition of the independence of this very Government of ours was first achieved by a treaty made with France. He goes on to set out in the same report that he does not maintain that a treaty forms the only method of recognizing the independence of another govern-

We all know what a great character in the history of our Republic Mr. Adams proved himself, and yet, occupying the position of Secretary of State in the Cabinet of Monroe, he never for one moment asserted the pretension that the power to recognize the independence of a foreign government was an executive function

Mr. HALE. Did the Senator notice the reference I made to Mr. Adams's action, taking part in the debate, where the resolution was modified, giving the discretion absolutely to the President, in which Mr. Adams said that it was exclusively an executive matter?

Mr. CHILTON. You can find where the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. Morgan] made a similar statement on one occasion, and yet in his well-considered speech on the Brazilian question he maintained the true doctrine that it is a function belonging to the Congress as well as the President.

Mr. HALE. As the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Platt] just suggests, the treaty-making power is executive; the Senate is joined to the President in executive action. That is not legis-

Mr. CHILTON. I do not say that it is legislative solely, but I say it belongs to different departments of the Government. It is not necessary that the President of the United States should come out with a formal proclamation acknowledging the independence of another country. If he were to receive an ambassador from the Republic of Cuba, that would constitute a recognition of the independence of that nation.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from Texas allow me a moment?

Mr. CHILTON. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. My opinion has been quoted here, but the quotation does not do justice to my statement. Whenever I stated that the President of the United States had the exclusive right to recognize the independence of another country, it was in connection with the fact that that exclusive right was a right that belonged to him ex officio, and did not at all affect the people of the United States. I always put that qualification in. It is a mere piece of diplomatic authority which he derives under the laws of nations, which are recognized in the Constitution.

Mr. CHILTON. I hope the Senator will not understand me as twitting him about his position at all. On the contrary, I was merely using that suggestion to illustrate how distinguished men, sometimes improvidently, use expressions which do not maturely state their real opinions.

Mr. MORGAN. I would not have made the slightest statement in regard to it but for the fact that the Secretary of State is reported in the newspapers to have made that quotation upon me, as if I had stated it as a proposition of universal law that the President of the United States had the exclusive right to recognize the independence of a foreign country. As soon as the Senator from Texas has concluded, if I can get the floor for five minutes, I want to explain that a little further.

Mr. CHILTON. I will explain to the Senator from Alabama and to the Senate that he will find in the speech which he made on the question of the Brazilian recognition a very fair view of this subject. In that speech he states in very clear language the true doctrine which governs.

But I will get back to the report of John Quincy Adams. The Senator from Maine has read, and no doubt remembers, that while Mr. Adams claims that the recognition of the independence of another country can be most feasibly accomplished by treaty, yet there are still other methods of doing it. That is all which is necessary to be said now, in my judgment.

In the judicial authorities there is outlined the idea that the recognition of independence or belligerency (functions of the same general kith and kin) is not an exclusive power of either branch of the Government. In the well-known case of Kennett vs. Chambers the court alludes to the recognition of independence as a part of the treaty-making power. You can find in other judicial opinions—one I remember by Mr. Justice Field, when he was on the circuit—a reference to the power as one which belongs to the executive and legislative departments of the Government. It seems to me that is a sound doctrine. If the President of the United States should receive an ambase der from the Pennshlic of United States should receive an ambassador from the Republic of Cuba, that would constitute a recognition of that Government. If the President and the Senate should make a treaty in which they recognized the Island of Cuba as an independent republic, that would also constitute a recognition of its independence. If that would also constitute a recognition of its independence. In the President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives, or Congress, as I should say, should pass a law which recognized the independence of Cuba, that, too, would constitute its effective recognition. It does not make any difference about the form it takes. The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts a moment ago seemed to intimate that Congress can do it under the lawago seemed to intimate that Congress can do it tinder the law-making power, as under the power to regulate foreign commerce. I believe he intimates also that perhaps the President and the Senate could do it under the treaty-making power, but I gather that he thinks Congress can not do it by saying it in so many words. But, sir, the President's only authority to recognize the words. But, sir, the President's only authority to recognize the independence of another country is incidental. It is incidental just as the power of Congress to deal with the same subject is incidental, and just as the same authority is incidental to the power of the President and the Senate. All I maintain and want to say here

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to put a question there, because my mind and his seem to have traveled very much in the same channel, so far as I understand the Senator?

Mr. CHILTON. Thank you.

Mr. HOAR. I agree with the Senator that the power of recognizing a foreign country is incident to certain legislative powers; it is incident to certain purely executive powers, as the receiving and sending of ambassadors; it is incident to certain powers which are shared by the President and Senate, which are sometimes spoken of as executive powers, but are, in strictness, legislative powers, because the Constitution, if I remember the phraseology correctly, declares that treaties are the laws of the land, and therefore to make a treaty is to make a law of the land. Therefore the President and the Senate legislate when they make a treaty, in my But that is a question of name and not of substance.

But what I want to get the Senator's view upon, to see whether he differs or agrees with me, is, when you are not doing the principal thing at all to which this recognition of a foreign government is an incident, where there is any power lodged in Congress, then to say simply not, "We regulate by law the behavior of a citizen in Cuban waters in his dealing with Cuba and require him to obin Cuban waters in his dealing with Cuba and require him to observe the rules which apply to an independent government," but where we say purely and simply, "We recognize the independence of Cuba," and say nothing else, because you have an incidental power to do that when you are doing something else, and it is your business to do it, have you a right to declare the independence of Cuba by the legislative branch of the Government of the country and make that an act binding on citizens and binding on other departments of the Government? That is the question.

Mr. CHILTON. I think so clearly.

Mr. HOAR. In other words suppose we pass a law declaring

Mr. CHILTON. I think so clearly.

Mr. HOAR. In other words, suppose we pass a law declaring the independence of Cuba on the 3d day of March, 1897, over the veto of the President and adjourn and do not come together until the following December, has the President of the United States, for all his constitutional purposes, got to deal with Cuba as an independent power until the first Monday of next December, or if Spain occupied every foot on that island by the 1st of April, has the President any right to accommodate the action of this Government to that new condition? There is the practical question before us. before us

Mr. CHILTON. I want to say, in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, that the President has not any express authority to do this as the principal thing either. Here is the mistake the Senator makes, in my humble judgment.

Mr. HOAR. I have not said anything about that, and whether I have made a mistake or not will appear when I have made a statement on that subject, which I have not yet done.

Mr. CHILTON. The Senator seems to think the President has some express power to do it, and that the other departments of the Government have only an incidental power to do it.

Mr. HOAR. I did not say any such thing.

Mr. CHILTON. Excuse me. Here is the true position: The President only has the authority to recognize the independence of another country as incidental to his power to receive ambassadors.

Mr. HOAR. I agree to that

Mr. HOAR. I agree to that.

Mr. CHILTON. Therefore, if he concluded to issue a proclamation in formal terms and should say, "The independence of the Island of Cuba is hereby recognized," Congress can do the same thing as one of its incidental powers.

Mr. HOAR. I hate to interrupt the Senator, because I agree with so much that he has said, but I should like, with his leave, to put the proposition in my own way. I have sent for a resolution, which is now pending in the Senate, introduced by the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. Bacon] and referred to the Judiciary Committee, of which I am a member, and it is this:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring). That the question of the recognition by this Government of any people as a free and independent nation is one exclusively for the determination of Congress in its capacity as the lawmaking power;

Resolved further. That this prerogative of sovereign power does not appertain to the executive department of the Government, except in so far as the President is, under the Constitution, by the exercise of the veto, made a part of the lawmaking power of the Government.

want to understand what the Senator thinks about that Mr. CHILTON. I do not concur in that statement at all.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Texas will permit me, if I understand him, he maintains that this is a concurrent power?
Mr. CHILTON. That is right; a concurrent power, just like the powers of the Federal and State courts.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will permit me a moment further, I want to see to what that leads. Under that view, whichever power first takes jurisdiction its action will be legal and binding; in other words, whichever makes the recognition first makes a valid recognition.

Mr. CHILTON. That is right—whichever makes the recognition

Mr. BACON. One step further, if you please. Therefore, the Senator's contention must necessarily lead to the conclusion that where one department fails to act the other can act?

Mr. CHILTON. Not at all. Mr. BACON. There is no possibility of an escape from that,

Where there is a failure to act on the part of one department, necessarily when the other acts its action must be valid.

Mr. CHILTON. The trouble about the Senator's position is that it confuses two things which ought to be separated. I maintain that whenever one of these departments exercises this power as incidental to some other authority conferred by the Constitution, then the recognition is complete; but until one or the other does act, the other may act. That is the true position, in my judgment.

Mr. HOAR. To what power is the resolution before the Senate incident?

Mr. CHILTON. It is incident to the power to regulate foreign commerce; it is incident to the power to make war-to either of

Mr. HOAR. Are we making war or regulating foreign commerce now? If the Senator will pardon me, this is a form of recognition by Congress with nothing attached to it, not incident to anything, and with nothing incident to it.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from Texas allow me?
Mr. CHILTON. In one moment I will yield to the Senator, after
I have replied to the Senator from Massachusetts. It seems to me the Senator from Massachusetts comes back to the same theory, that the Constitution gives the President some express authority concerning the subject. But I repeat that you do not find in that instrument any express authority conferred on the President to recognize independence, and you might as well say when he issues a proclamation recognizing the independence of the Republic of Cuba that he is not thereby receiving an ambassador. Yet we know he derives the authority to recognize independence from we know he derives the authority to recognize independence from that clause of the Constitution which confers upon him the jurisdiction to receive ambassadors. So, now, if we were to recognize the independence of Cuba, we might not be, in so many words, dealing with commerce; we might not be, in so many words, making war, but our authority to recognize independence would depend upon those clauses of the Constitution which gave us the authority to regulate commerce and to make war. The power to recognize is expressed nowhere. That is the point. Wherever you find it, this power is incidental—that is the proposition which I make—but it is incidental to the functions which are conferred upon several different departments of the Government. Now I yield

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator has got right to the point where I desire to ask him a question. The Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Texas seem to agree to this proposition: That the power to recognize the independency of a people or a government is simply an incidental power, or a power incident to the exercise of some other power expressly conferred by the Con-stitution. Now, does the Senator deny the proposition that Con-gress and the President, acting concurrently, could, by a mere declaration, an act of Congress authorizing the declaration, and a declaration, an act of Congress authorizing the declaration, and a declaration itself, or a proclamation by the President, recognize the independence of Cuba?

Mr. CHILTON. I have been talking here for five or ten minutes endeavoring to maintain that very proposition, that Congress does have the authority to do it.

Mr. Allen. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Texas, who were interchanging courtesies, which was perfectly proper, to agree that the power to recognize the independency of a government was only incident to the exercise of some other power expressly conferred by the Constitution.

Mr. CHILTON. Yes, sir; but I do not think it is necessary to say in the resolution, "We are regulating commerce," or, "We are making war." You may do it, and then after it is done you have to refer it to some one of those powers of government. That is the proposition.

Mr. ALLEN. Suppose we should pass a resolution here declar-ing it to be the sense of Congress that there is a well-established Republic in Cuba, and that it should be recognized, and following that the President of the United States should issue a proclamation or in some other public form recognize the existence of that Republic; that would be a direct recognition and not an incident to the exercise of any other power. Do we not possess that power under our Constitution?

Mr. CHILTON. I think it is very clear that our resolution is valid, no matter what form it takes. In fact, I do not think it requires any proclamation of recognition at all. That form is not necessary. If the President of the United States to-morrow were necessary. If the President of the United States to-morrow were to receive an ambassador from the Republic of Cuba and never say a word about recognizing its independence, that would nevertheless constitute a recognition of its independence. The very act of receiving an ambassador is an acknowledgment of the independence of the country from which the ambassador comes.

Therefore I say the power to recognize independence does not depend upon the form that it takes at all. It does not depend upon depend upon the form that it takes at all. It does not depend upon any particular language being used, but whenever independence is recognized either by the President, or by the Senate and the President, under the treaty-making power, or by the President, the Senate, and the House as a Congress, it is final. That is my proposition. It is a concurrent power to recognize, and whenever either authority actually makes the recognition the jurisdiction is exhausted.

exhausted.

Mr. MORGAN obtained the floor.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Alabama yield to me that I may move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business?

Mr. MORGAN. I merely wish to say a very few words, and I would rather have them go into the Record now.

Mr. President, the particular point of constitutional power and of the regularity of governmental procedure which is involved in this debate is about to have, I suppose, a very practical illustra-tion in our own history. We have here in Washington City, I am informed by the papers, a gentleman who has been accredited to the United States Government and received by the President on an exchange of felicitations between them, who comes from a new Government, that is, the Government called the Greater Republic of Central America. I can not call his name, because I am not informed of it and do not know it personally. The Congress of the United States has no official knowledge of his presence in of the United States has no official knowledge of his presence in this city that I am aware of. That gentleman professes to represent a new institution down there, called the Greater Republic of Central America, composed, if I remember it correctly, of the States of San Salvador, Nicaragua, and Honduras.

Now, we have laws which authorize a minister to be sent to each of those Governments, I believe. I know we have such laws as to two of those countries, and I believe we have laws that authorize a minister to be sent to each. Those three Governments have abolished their office of foreign affairs, and we now have ministers there from the United States to those Governments who have no chance to communicate with them because they have abolished the office of foreign affairs and have intrusted all of their diplomatic powers to this diet, as it is called, which sends the gentleman here powers to this diet, as it is called, which sends the gentleman here powers to this diet, as it is called, which sends the gentleman here as minister from the Greater Republic.

I desire, for the purpose of giving a forcible illustration of the real practical question involved in this debate, to ask a question. Does the recognition of that gentleman as a minister from the Greater Republic of Central America repeal the laws of the United States by which we send ambassadors to Honduras and San Salvador and Nicaragua? I think almost anybody would hold that those laws are not repealed; that the President of the United States, by recognizing the new Government there, which in its diplomatic function combines the powers of all three of those States, has not succeeded in repealing the laws of the United States which authorize and require that ministers shall be sent to those Governments.

those Governments.

those Governments.

Mr. HOAR. They do not require it.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, why so? Why is that? Do I deny the validity of the President's act in receiving that gentleman here? Not at all. But I deny its binding force upon the legislative power of this country. I deny that it has in any respect changed the laws of the United States, and that until Congress acts, either by a confirmation of some nomination which the President may send have to the Senate or by some legislative act or some legislative. here to the Senate, or by some legislative act or some legisla-tive recognition, those three Republics of Central America will stand there as sovereign States, entitled to receive ministers from us, and so far as we are concerned entitled to hold with us diplomatic correspondence. But so far as they are concerned that power has lapsed, and it has been merged into the centralized functions of the diet which sends the minister here.

Now, that presents the whole situation. What are we going to do in a case of that kind? I have been very much in hope that the President would honor Congress with some statement about the matter, but it seems that we have so far departed out of his recognition that he does not consider that we have anything to do even with a matter of that magnitude. Perhaps he will change his opinion if he ever sends here the nomination of an ambassador or a minister to be sent to that diet, or if he sends the recall of the ministers from these other Governments on the ground that he and the diet have abolished those offices. Suppose he shall come out and tell us that he and the diet of the Greater Republic have abol-ished the missions to Nicaragua, San Salvador, and Honduras. Then we would have a practical illustration of where the division

Then we would have a practical illustration of where the division line is between the powers of the President and the powers of Congress. That would present it, and when that question comes here it will be presented, and it will be decided.

I think that so far as I am personally concerned I am not without the guide of the Constitution in the statement I make here, that I believe that gentleman has the right which belongs to a minister of a foreign government at this seat of government; that is to say, he has the right to the preservation of his personal security, and that of his servants, his attachés, and members of his staff. Probably he would have a right, recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States, to go into that tribunal on an original suit for some wrong that might have been done him. The President's recognition of him is so far a valid and binding official act dent's recognition of him is so far a valid and binding official act as that it confers upon him the functions and characteristics of a minister while he is within our jurisdiction.

Therefore it is not an idle act, but it is one that he may perform without the consent or the assistance of Congress. It is one that falls within the classification I have mentioned every time I have had occasion to present the subject at all, which, while it concludes the President, concludes the minister, concludes the foreign government, as to this gentleman being the authenticated minister from that country, with due credentials, affects the people of the United States not at all. Now, why? Because the President in the performance of that act has merely executed a law. He has performed an executive function, not a legislative function. He had the right to perform it, fully to perform it, but it is an executive act and no more. It is not in any sense a legislative act.

Where then does he get the power to reafewer this executive accountive.

Where, then, does he get the power to perform this executive act? We look about through the Constitution. It is not a power derived from the right to do anything that the President has the right to do, to make treaties or to make nominations to office. Where does it come from? It comes from the laws of nations. What are the laws of nations to us? A recognized code named in the Constitution. Congress, by the Constitution, shall have power to pass laws to punish violations of the laws of nations. Therefore we recognize the laws of nations in the Constitution itself. That falls in line with a theory of mine, and I take great pride in being a devotee to it, which is that the Government of the United States, in all its external functions, powers, relations, and duties, is the equal of any other government in the world. It has all the power of an extraterritorial character of any other government in the world. How does it get those powers? By placing itself amongst the family of nations and accepting in its Constitution all the laws of nations.

The Constitution says that the executive power is devolved upon

The Constitution says that the executive power is devolved upon the President of the United States, and further it says he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed. What laws? Intake care that the laws be faithfully executed. What laws? International as well as local—all laws that bind the people of the United States, and all laws that make for their advantage. The President shall see that they are faithfully executed. Now we come to what the laws of nations prescribe or permit in respect, come to what the laws of nations prescribe or permit in respect, for instance, of the reception of foreign ministers. They permit and they prescribe that one holding credentials to a foreign government, no matter where that government may be, from another government, shall present his credentials to the diplomatic head of the country, whether that may be a sovereign who has the right to send an ambassador abroad or a limited sovereign who has not that right perhaps as an individual or as a personal sovereign right. It makes no difference what the character may be, whoever repre-

It makes no difference what the character may be, whoever represents the diplomatic powers of the government, as they are recognized under the laws of nations, is the proper person to whom those credentials shall be presented.

After we did that in our Constitution, we commenced to put restrictions upon the President of the United States. He shall exercise his function of executing the laws of nations, but Congress has the right to pass laws to inflict punishment for a violation of the laws of nations. Congress has the right to repeal the laws of nations so far as they affect our people. Congress did it when it passed all this series of acts under which we have hid so much commention lately in respect to the security of foreign much commotion lately in respect to the security of foreign countries because of the disposition of our own people to go out and raid and furnish others with military munitions and sup-plies. Congress has exercised that function beyond the function and power and scope of the laws of nations. We have gone fur-plies. Congress has exercised that function beyond the function and power and scope of the laws of nations. We have gone further than the laws of nations in that particular.

I come back now to the simple proposition, What, then, is the office of the President of the United States in respect of the recognition of a foreign government? So far as it relates to any executive function of his, he has the right and must have the exclusive right, but when by such a recognition he wants to change the legal relation or status between us and any other country, there his right, but when by such a recognition he wants to change the legal relation or status between us and any other country, there his power stops. He can bow a minister into the doors of the Government; he can pass upon his credentials; he can welcome him to our shores; he can throw around him the ægis of the protection of this Government, but he can not compel us to respond to that. He can not compel us in any legislative sense to recognize the combination of those three Governments constituting the Central combination of those three Governments constituting the Central American Greater Republic—not at all.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to put a question to the Senator from Alabama right here, which seems to be the proper point in his argument. I desire to put this illustration, if the Senator pleases: We recognize Cuba by joint resolution passed over the President's veto, or it becomes a law by his retaining it in his pocket ten days, or in any other way. In the meantime Spain makes war upon us. We declare war on her and adjourn on the 4th of March. Now, there is Cuba recognized as a free and independent nation, if the act of Congress can do it, without the President's action, and there is Spain at war with us.

Spain conquers Cuba; the rebels submit, and she takes possession of every part of the island by the 1st of May, Congress not being in session, and it becomes a base of supplies and of warlike operations against us. Is the President of the United States bound, until we get together in December and repeal our action, to treat Cuba under those circumstances as a friendly nation which we shall not attack or fight with?

Mr. MORGAN. I think I can answer the question by a very simple illustration, which I think the Senator will admit to be a correct one. If at any time during the period between the adjournment and the acts weeting of Congress and before meaning the period between the adjournment and the acts weeting of Congress and before meaning the period between the adjournment and the acts weeting of Congress and before meaning the period between the adjournment and the acts weeting of Congress and before meaning the period between the adjournment and the acts weeting of Congress and before meaning the period between the adjournment and the acts weeting of Congress and before meaning the period between the adjournment and the acts weeting of Congress and before meaning the period between the adjournment and the acts weeting of Congress and before meaning the period between the adjournment.

simple illustration, which I think the Senator will admit to be a correct one. If at any time during the period between the adjournment and the next meeting of Congress, and before we changed our attitude, after we had recognized the Republic of Cuba by a joint resolution of the twe Houses of Congress in the most formal possible way, aship bearing the flag of the Republic of Cuba should enter the port of Boston, the officers of the port would be compelled to recognize her not merely as belonging to a government, but as belonging to a friendly government, and to give her hospitality and all that. It would be a law passed by Congress which binds all officers of the United States until it is repealed.

Mr. HOAR. Including the President?

Mr. MORGAN. Now, suppose, as the Senator says, the next day after we adjourn Spain overwhelms Cuba; they make peace; the subjugation comes, and all that, so that the revolution no longer exists and peace prevails there by the consent of Cuba. That does not repeal the act of Congress, Mr. President.

Mr. HOAR. Can the President fit out an expedition during that time to capture Moro Castle?

Mr. MORGAN. That depends upon the war-making power.

Mr. HOAR. I understand that.

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, yes; if we are at war it changes the whole relation of the United States. When we are in a state of war with Spain about Cuba or anything else every man in the United States is by law an enemy of every Spaniard in the world.

Mr. HOAR. Exactly.

Mr. MORGAN. His status is fixed by law. But the state of war, as it is known to the law, is utterly different from the state of peace, and the rules of law applicable to war do not apply at all to a state of peace. Idid not remember that that category was in the Senator's question. So the other one is perfectly plain.

I will suppose that we are not at war, but that we have recognized the independence of Cuba. Congress has adjourned. Spain and Cuba are at war. Spain overwhelms Cuba. Cuba makes peace, surrenders, and submits. Until Congress changes the law, if a ship comes into a port of the United States bearing the flag of the Republic of Cuba, we are bound to respect it, and so is every officer, because the laws of the United States are paramount, and the Republic of Cuba, we are bound to respect it, and so is every officer, because the laws of the United States are paramount, and the Republic of Cuba, we are bound to respect it, and so is every officer, because the laws of the United States are paramount, and they stay there until they are repealed.

Mr. HOAR. We are bound, the Senator would say, to give the necessary papers at the custom-house to this ship, which is bound for Cuba, although it is in the possession of the enemy and the stores would at once become supplies of war against us.

Mr. MORGAN. Exactly so, unless the Secretary of the Treasury has some latitude in the regulations he may form which would relieve him of the difficulty. I hope he has, and I expect he has, although I am not quite sure of it. But in a case of that kind I suppose the Secretary of the Treasury would have some power of regulation that would relieve the country of the anomalous embarrassment and situation.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Ohio yield to me-before his motion is acted upon, simply to ask that the pending joint resolution may lie upon the table?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly, for one moment.

Mr. BACON. I merely wish to ask that the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Texas may lie on the table, in order that on Wednesday morning next at the conclusion of the morning business I may submit some remarks thereon.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I believe the debate has been proceeding.

morning business I may submit some remarks thereon.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I believe the debate has been proceeding by unanimous consent, and I desire now to have the unfinished business laid before the Senate.

FREE HOMESTEADS IN OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by title.

The Secretary. A bill (H. R. 3656) providing for free homesteads on the public lands in Oklahoma Territory for actual and bona fide settlers, and reserving the public lands for that purpose.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I now ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be taken up to-morrow morning immediately after the routine morning business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. Browning, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1726) to approve and ratify the construction of a bridge across the Red River between the States of Arkansas and Texas, at a point above the town of Fulton, in Arkansas, on said river, built by the Texarkana Northern Railway Company, but now owned and operated by the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company, and to authorize the latter company to maintain said bridge over said waterway, subject to certain stipulations and conditions, with an amendment in which it requested the concurrence of the

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. 3877) granting a pension to Henderson Marple;
A bill (H. R. 5407) to remove the charge of desertion now standing against Oscar A. Bulette, known in his military title as Austin Bulette, late private in Company E, Fifty-second Illinois Infantry Volunteers, during late war;
A bill (H. R. 7777) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to furnish condemned cannon to Fort Thomas, Ky.; and purposes.
A bill (H. R. 7945) to provide for the entry of lands in Greer County, Okla., to give preference rights to settlers, and for other purposes.

USE OF MONEY IN ELECTIONS.

Mr. ALLEN. With the consent of the Senator from Ohio, I desire to ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a careful analysis of the vote at the recent election as bearing upon the result of the Presidental election in support of the resolution introduced by me a week or two ago.

Mr. HILL. What is the paper?
Mr. ALLEN. It is an analysis of the Presidential vote of the United States, and is very brief.
Mr. HILL. Who makes it?
Mr. ALLEN. It was prepared by Mr. Emerson, a very competent gentleman.

Mr. HILL. I object. Let it be printed as a document. I do not believe in encumbering the RECORD with everybody's effusions.

Mr. ALLEN. I am willing to take it as a document, by the grace of the Senator from New York.

Mr. HILL. I have no objection to that.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The paper will be printed as a document, in the absence of objection.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I renew my motion for an executive session. The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and twelve minntes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 12, 1897, at 12 o'clock meridian.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

PACIFIC RAILROAD FUNDING BILL.

The SPEAKER. The first business under the special order is the vote upon the various propositions connected with the bill H. R. No. 8189. The Chair desires to state the condition of affairs the vote upon the various propositions connected with the bill H. R. No. 8189. The Chair desires to state the condition of affairs to the House. As the Chair understands it, there are no amendments offered to the original bill. There are two substitutes, to one of which an amendment is offered. It will be necessary first to vote upon that amendment to the substitute in order to perfect it. And when that has been done the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Bell] will first be voted upon, and if it is adopted it will take the place of the original bill, as being, in the judgment of the House, the position it ought to take; and there will be no vote upon the other substitute. If the substitute of the gentleman from Texas is not adopted, then the question will recur with regard to the first substitute. That will then be voted upon. The Chair has an idea that is the understanding of the House and that that will do justice to the condition of the bill.

House and that that will do justice to the condition of the bill.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The Chair is mistaken in saying that there are no amendments to the original bill. There are committee amendments that have been adopted in the Committee of the Whole. There were no amendments pending in the Committee of the Whole. The question will be taken first on the committee amendments to the original bill.

amendments to the original bill.

Mr. POWERS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. POWERS. I apprehend the Chair is in error as to the status of the two substitutes. The substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Bell] is offered as a substitute for the substitute offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Harrison].

Mr. BELL of Texas. And for the bill.

Mr. POWERS. And for the bill. It is first a substitute for the proposition of the gentleman from Alabama, not, as I understand, antagonizing the bill in the first instance, but first antagonizing the substitute of the gentleman from Alabama.

the substitute of the gentleman from Alabama.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the amendment offered to the other substitute is in the nature of a substitute itself.

Mr. POWERS. It is. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTHWAY] practically substitutes one section for another, if my understanding is correct.

Mr. NORTHWAY. There are four sections in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HARRISON], and I propose to amend only two of those sections. Mine is an amendment to the substitute.

Mr. TERRY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. I understood the Chair to announce a while ago that there was only one amendment, an amendment to the substitute of the gentleman from Alabama. As I understand it, the Committee of the Whole

The SPEAKER. The Chair corrected his original statement.

The Chair had been told that there were no pending amendments, and technically there are no pending amendments in the sense of and technically there are no pending amendments in the sense of their being pending in the committee. The Chair subsequently announced that there were amendments made in Committee of the Whole on which the vote would first be taken. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Powers] seems to think that the Chair is misinformed as to the order of the substitutes.

Mr. POWERS. I beg the Chair's pardon—not as to the order, but as to the form in which the substitute of the gentleman from Texas was ordered. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Harrison] first offered his substitute. The gentleman from Texas, of course, would have no parliamentary status to offer an independent substitute to the bill, but he could offer his amendment as a substitute for the substitute proposed by the gentleman from as a substitute for the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Alabama, and he did so offer it in form.

The SPEAKER. Was that done by unanimous consent?

Mr. DOCKERY. It was.
The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Vermont read the form in which the substitute of the gentleman from Texas was offered? The Chair was informed that the way in which the consent of the House was given was as the Chair stated it.

Mr. BELL of Texas. Here is what took place. I read from

Mr. Bell of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the other day I had printed in the RECORD a substitute which I now ask unanimous consent to offer as a substitute for the substitute of the gentleman from Alabama and for the pending bill.

The SPEAKER. If by consent of the House the proposition was offered as a substitute for the substitute of the gentleman Mr. BELL of Texas. And also, by consent of the House, it was offered as a substitute for the pending bill.

The SPEAKER. It can not be both.

Mr. BELL of Texas. It can by unanimous consent, can it not? The SPEAKER. It makes very little difference, inasmuch as was all done by consent of the House.

Mr. BELL of Texas. When I offered my substitute, the Chair stated it in this way:

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. Bell] asks permission to offer a substitute, which has already been printed in the Record, and which he now sends to the Clerk's desk—a substitute for the substitute offered by the gentleman from Alabama. Is there objection to the substitute of the gentleman from Texas being considered as pending? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. POWERS. That is correct.
The SPEAKER. The first question is on agreeing to the amendments of the committee adopted in Committee of the Whole. If no separate vote is asked for, the Chair will put the question on the no separate vote is asked for, the Chair will put the question on the amendments as a whole.

Mr. POWERS. Those amendments are entirely satisfactory to the committee, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, those are amendments to the original bill.

The SPEAKER. They are amendments to the original bill.

The amendments were adopted.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTHWAY] to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Harrison]. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Acheson.

Settle.

The amendment of Mr. Northway was read, as follows:

Strike out all of section 1, after the words "Section 1," and insert the 10-lowing:

"That a commission consisting of three persons, to be named, one each, by the Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary of the Interior, and Attorney-General, shall be constituted, with full power to settle, adjust, or compromise the indebtedness of any and all of the bond-aided Pacific railroads to the Government of the United States upon such terms and in such manner as may be agreed upon by such road or roads and such commission: Provided, That any and all settlements thus made shall be submitted in writing to the President for his approval or disapproval, and when approved by him shall be binding as a valid agreement."

In lieu of section 4 insert the following:

"SEC. 4. That each of said commissioners shall receive pay at the rate of $30 per day for the time necessarily spent by them as such commissioners, and the sum of $15,000, or so much thereof as may be needed to pay such commissioners and to pay the expenses incident to such settlement and to carry out the provisions of this act, is hereby appropriated out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

The amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the substitute of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Bell] for the substitute offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Harrison].

The question being taken, the Speaker declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered, 71 members voting therefor. Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Of course I shall vote against both substitutes, but should like to know, for my own guidance, whether, if the Bell substitute is adopted, that will not eliminate the Harrison substitute from further consideration? The SPEAKER. It will. The question will then come upon the adoption of the substitute of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Bell] for the original bill. The question now is on the adoption of a substitute of the gentleman from Texas for the substitute of the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 110, nays 157, not

So the House refused to order the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

[The announcement of the result was received with applause.]
Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ascertain now if a motion to reconsider and lay on the table would be in order.
The SPEAKER. It would.
On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, a motion to reconsider the last vote taken and to lay that motion on the table was adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, this being the day set apart by the rules for the consideration of business reported from the Com-mittee on the District of Columbia, and that committee having teveral important matters to present which are not yet perfected, I would ask unanimous consent that next Monday may be considered as District day instead of this.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentle-man from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. TALBERT. I wish to ask if the permission to extend remarks in the RECORD upon the Pacific Railroad bill, which has just been rejected, applied only to those who have addressed the House upon the subject, or whether it embraced any members who desired to do so?

The SPEAKER. The recollection of the Chair is that it applied to persons who have spoken upon the subject.

only to persons who have spoken upon the subject.

Mr. TALBERT. I ask unanimous consent that this consent be extended to all members for ten days.

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Platt, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution (H. Res. 213) to permit railroads in the District to occupy additional parts of streets to accommodate the traveling public attending the inaugural ceremonies.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 3313) for the relief of John N. Quackenbush, late a commander in the United States Navy; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following Senate bills were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A bill (S. 3219) donating condemned cannon and cannon balls to Wadsworth Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Helena, Mont.—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 3313) for the relief of John N. Quackenbush, late commander in the United States Navy—to the Committee on Naval lowing titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

PACIFIC RAILROAD FUNDING BILL.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit this bill to the Committee on the Pacific Railroads. It is apparent that the temper of the House is against the principle embodied in the bill, but it is equally apparent, to my mind at least, that every member wants something to be done to adjust this indebtedness.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, we can not hear the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. POWERS. I will repeat. I say that it is manifest by the vote just taken that the House is opposed to the principle embodied in the bill. I believe, though, that every member here desires some action in the premises, and if this is recommitted to the committee we will attempt to formulate a bill that will meet the approval of the House.

I move, therefore, that it be recommitted to the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves that this bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Pacific Railroads.

Mr. DOCKERY. Is that motion in order?
Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, a point of order against that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri will state the point of order.

Mr. DOCKERY.
The SPEAKER. I desire to raise the point of order against it.

On what ground? Because the motion is not in order at this time. Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. HUBBARD. The motion is not in order because the House has killed the bill by the action just taken.

Mr. DOCKERY. The motion to recommit, as I understand it, can be made after the previous question is ordered and after the bill has been ordered to its engrossment and third reading. I have not the rules before me. But the House, by an overwhelming vote, refused to order the engrossment and third reading of this bill. I desire to submit, further, that there has been intervening business. The chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia claimed the floor, and under the rule secured the consent of the House to substitute next Monday for to-day. Other matters of business have also intervened.

The SPEAKER. By the order of the House it was provided that the "previous question be ordered on this bill to its final passage, and the final vote thereon should be taken immediately after the reading of the Journal" to-day (Monday). So the previous question was ordered.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is true; but in this case, as I understand the parliamentary situation, the vote has been taken on the proposition to engross the bill and order it to a third reading. The House refused to order the bill to be engrossed and read a third time, and thereupon a motion was made to reconsider and lay on the table the vote by which the House refused to order its engrossment. The gentleman from Vermont now seeks to interpose a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. But the House, although it might have refused

The SPEAKER. But the House, although it might have refused the bill on its passage in the House, may desire to recommit it for further action on the part of the committee.

Mr. DOCKERY. I have been looking for the section of the rule that applies to this situation, but have so far been unable to find it. I am of the opinion, however, that the motion to recommit is not in order until after the bill has been ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The situation, the Chair will state, is rather an unusual one, and unless there is some authority on the subject to be submitted now perhaps the matter had better go over until to be submitted now perhaps the matter had better go over until to-morrow

Mr. DOCKERY. I am quite content that it shall go over until to-morrow morning immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, there is another suggestion I would like to make in this connection. By an overwhelming vote of the House, not only has this bill been killed by refusing to order it to engrossment and third reading, but it has been killed and put into its coffin, and by the "eternal-cinch" effect of the motion to reconsider and lay on the table the coffin has been nailed up. I do not see how the motion of the gentleman from Vermont can resurrect see how the motion of the gentleman from vermont can resurrect a body as dead as that is. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman may possibly mislead the House by too much metaphor.

Mr. DOCKERY. I understand this will go over until after the reading of the Journal to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to look into it. The Chair does not remember any such occurrence heretofore.

TITLES AND UNIFORMS OF EX-ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9710) to authorize officers who served during the war of the rebellion in the Regular Army to bear the title and, on occasions of ceremony, wear the uniform of their highest rank.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all officers who have served during the rebellion as officers of the Regular Army of the United States, and have been honorably discharged or resigned from the service, shall be entitled to bear the official title and, upon occasions of ceremony, to wear the uniform of the highest grade they have held, by brevet or other commission, as is now authorized for officers of volunteers by section 1226, Revised Statutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BAILEY. Reserving the right to object, I should like to hear some explanation of the bill.

Mr. HULL. With the consent of the House, I want to make a very brief statement. Immediately after the war Congress passed wauthorizing the officers of the volunteer service to wear their uniforms on occasions of ceremony, but did not provide for offi-cers who served during the war in the Regular Army and who resigned. This bill is simply to extend the provisions of that sec-tion of the statute, so that officers of the Regular Army who served during the war and who have resigned or been honorably discharged may have the same right that the volunteer officers have had ever since the war closed.

Mr. BAILEY. It involves no charge on the Treasury?

Mr. HULL. Absolutely none. It is simply a matter of sentiment.

Mr. CANNON. I suppose the officer will continue to wear his uniform of actual grade at all other times except on ceremonious occasions?

Mr. HULL. It does not affect the officers now in the Army at It only affects those who have resigned and who are no longer connected with the Army.

Mr. BOUTELLE. What grade of uniform do they wear?
Mr. HULL. The highest grade that they had during the war.
Mr. WADSWORTH. Why should they wear the uniform at all now, if they are not connected with the service?

Mr. HULL. Why should the volunteer officers?
Mr. WADSWORTH. For services rendered.
Mr. BOUTELLE. I should like to have the bill read again.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the bill.
The bill was again read.
The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

W. H. WADE.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk. Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair entertain a motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of appropriation bills?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to make that

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to make that motion.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering appropriation bills, with a view to calling up the Military Academy appropriation bill.

Mr. TRACEY. I trust the gentleman will withhold that motion just a minute, in order that the House may consider the bill (H. R. 9593) for the relief of W. H. Wade, late captain and acting regimental quartermaster Thirty-first Ohio Volunteers. It will take only a minute.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I consent to the consideration of that bill.

that bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to credit the account of W. H. Wade on the books of the Department, as captain and acting regimental quartermaster of the Thirty-first Regiment of Ohio Volunteers, with the sum of $420.15, received by him as such captain and acting regimental quartermaster and disbursed by him to extra-duty men for extra duty as of date the 13th day of September, A. D. 1862, and transmit to said W. H. Wade a receipt in full of all demands against him on said account; and that he cause all proceedings in the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Missouri against said W. H. Wade to be dismissed and satisfaction entered on the records of said court of any judgment therein rendered against him as such captain and acting regimental quartermaster on account of said receipt and disbursement of funds, of principal, interest, and costs of suit.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I should like to hear some explanation by the gentleman.

Mr. TRACEY. I will cheerfully make an explanation, Mr. Speaker. This bill has the unanimous report of the committee because of the merits which were apparent on the testimony offered, which testimony shows that in September, 1862, W. H. Wade was an officer in the Army of the United States, being captain of the Thirty-first Ohio Volunteers. At that time he was acting regimental quartermaster, and there was transmitted to him, through Col. A. J. Mackay, assistant quartermaster, $485.15, to be paid out by him on rolls to extra-duty men for extra duty performed. The money was paid out by him, as the proof shows to be paid out by him on rolls to extra-duty men for extra duty performed. The money was paid out by him, as the proof shows, on the rolls and vouchers, to the amount of $420.15. The remainder of the money, being withheld from payment by reason of the absence of a part of the men, was subsequently turned over by Captain Wade to M. D. W. Harman, acting assistant quartermaster of the United States Army, so that all of the money was accounted for by him, having been paid out to the men who were entitled to it, with the exception of that balance. He made a settlement with the Second Auditor of the Treasury, with whom he filed all of his vouchers, including the pay roll, but was not aware at the time that he was required to make a settlement with the Third Auditor of the Treasury.

He was given credit for the payment on his account, and he supposed his accounts were entirely settled, and had no other inforposed his accounts were entirely settled, and had no other information until a number of years after the war, when the Third Auditor of the Treasury informed him that this amount was still standing against him. In the first place, they said that Mr. Mackay was refused credit for the payment of this money to Wade; but subsequently he was allowed credit and his account settled. It would, therefore, be apparent that Mr. Wade ought to be allowed credit; and the officers of the Treasury think he ought to be allowed credit; but find themselves technically prevented from giving him credit. They themselves suggested this action of Congress in order that he may be credited with the amount asked, $420.15.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if there has been any adverse report by any committees of the House or Senate on this bill.

or Senate on this bill,

Mr. TRACEY. There never has been.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not object. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed. On motion of Mr. TRACEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. Hepburn in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 9707) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898; and I ask unanimous consent to omit the first reading of the bill, and to proceed at once to reading the bill by sections.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York calls up the bill H. R. 9707 for present consideration, and asks unanimous con-omitted. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would like to hear the title of the bill reported, so that we may know what it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the bill. The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9707) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill by sections.

Mr. DOCKERY. Before that is done—
Mr. RICHARDSON. I suppose general debate has not been closed on the bill. The bill is certainly open to discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, this is the bill for the support of the Military Academy, and carries an appropriation of $489,772.83, which is about $40,000 greater than the appropriation for the last year. That is occasioned by an increased attendance of cadets, which makes in the permanent establishment an increase of $4,000. For the extra pay of army officers at the Military Academy there is a reduction of $156 as compared with the last appropriation bill. For the pay of the military band there is a decrease of $2,220; for the civilian employees there is an increase of $1,000; for current and ordinary expenses an increase of $123; for miscellaneous and incidental expenses an increase of $1,826; for buildings and grounds an increase of $35,000.

There has been no material change in respect to any feature of the bill except in the division of buildings and grounds. The committee have recommended increased facilities for the purpose of providing pure water for the Academy. Until we reach that provision I can not think that there will be any question raised as to the action of the committee. All variation in the various items result from the fact that the officers detailed there are younger men and receive less compensation, or else in some of the miscellaneous items which are not usually carried at a uniform rate. The action of the committee has been taken with due regard to the condition of the Treasury, and they have avoided recommending such appropriation asked for which in the opinion of the committee the Treasury is not in a condition to meet.

I ask that the bill may be read under the five-minute rule.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of this

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill whether or not there are any increases of salary carried in the bill, and if so, to indicate to the House where they may be found.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. There is an increase of two clerks, one in the adjutant's and one in the quartermaster's department.

The salaries of these clerks were reduced some four or five years.

ago, I believe, and the last Congress restored all the salaries, excepting in these two cases.

Mr. DOCKERY. What does it amount to?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. The amount of increase is $200 in each case.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is the only increase of salaries carried? Mr. CURTIS of New York. Those are the only increases of Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if it makes any changes in existing law?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. It makes no change in existing law.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, when we reach the items involving increases in compensation, I trust the gentleman will indicate them. At this point I will only express my regret that the gentleman in charge of this bill, at a time when there is profound commercial stagnation throughout the land, should have found commercial stagnation throughout the land, should have thought it necessary to make an increase in this bill of $47,000 above the amount carried in the current law.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Only $40,000, and that arising almost entirely out of the necessity of improving the water facilities at the Academy. Mr. Chairman, if there are no further questions, I ask that the Clerk read the bill by paragraphs.

The Clerk (reading the bill by paragraphs) read as follows:

For extra pay of officers of the Army on detached service at the Military

For extra pay of officers of the Army on detached service at the Military Academy:
For pay of one Superintendent of the United States Military Academy (colonel), in addition to pay as major of engineers, $1,000;
For one commandant of cadets (lieutenant-colonel), in addition to pay as captain, not mounted, $1,200;
For pay of one instructor of practical military engineering (major), in addition to pay as captain, mounted, $500;
For pay of one instructor of ordnance and science of gunnery (major), in addition to pay as captain, mounted, $500;
For pay of eight assistant professors (captains), in addition to pay as first lieutenants, not mounted, $4,000;
For pay of four senior instructors of cavalry, artillery, infantry tactics, and ordnance and gunnery (captains), in addition to pay as first lieutenants, not mounted, $2,000;
For pay of four assistant instructors of cavalry, artillery, and infantry tactics (captains), in addition to pay as second lieutenants, not mounted, $2,400;
For pay of one adjutant, in addition to pay as second lieutenant, not mounted, $2,400;
For pay of one treasurer, quartermaster, and commissary of cadets, in addition to pay as captain, not mounted, $700;
Additional pay of bibrarian, $120;
For additional pay of professors and officers (and officers on increased rank) for length of service, $9,144.51;
In all, for extra pay of officers of the Army on detached service at the Military Academy, $21,894.51.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to get some informa-

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to get some information from the gentleman in charge of this bill about these extra allowances. For instance, "additional pay of librarian, $120."

allowances. For instance, "additional pay of librarian, $120." What is the necessity for that?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, this appropriation for extra compensation for the librarian has been customary from a period beyond which the memory of no man in this House runs. An officer is appointed to the position of librarian, and we allow him this extra compensation for the discharge of those duties.

Mr. HULL. And I will say further to the gentleman from Kansas that this is for extra work, and it is only fair that an officer who does extra work should receive some additional pay.

Mr. BLUE. If that is the case, why is this carried from year to year as an extra allowance, instead of being embodied in the general law?

general law?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Each grade of officer has his pre-scribed salary, but when an officer is detailed to this special duty he gets extra compensation. The librarian of the institution receives this extra allowance, and the instructors get a somewhat larger amount.

larger amount.

Mr. HULL. The librarian may be one man of a certain rank one year and another man of another grade the next year.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Chairman, if it is not too late, I would like also to get some explanation of the increased aggregate appropriated in the first paragraph of the bill. The total in that paragraph of the pending bill is $202,000, while I see that the appropriation last war were colly $198,000.

year was only $198,000.

Mr. HULL. That is under the head of "Permanent establishment" of the Academy. The small increase there results very largely from the detail of officers and the increased number of largely from the detail of officers and the increased number of cadets. Officers detailed for special duty at the Academy receive increased compensation according to their length of service, the older ones certain amounts and the younger ones smaller amounts, and the increase in this aggregate appropriation results from that and also from the increased number of cadets. I believe that we have at the Academy now about as large an attendance as we have ever had at any time. I will say to the gentleman from Kansas that this increase is due entirely, I believe, to the increase in the number of cadets.

compensation. To illustrate the principle, take the case of an officer in charge of public buildings and grounds here; his pay is always that of a colonel, whatever may be his rank, so that if a lieutenant were detailed to take charge of the public buildings and grounds, his pay would be that of a colonel.

Mr. BLUE. Has there been any attempt to increase salaries in this bill?

this bill?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I will say again to the gentleman from Kansas that there has been no attempt to increase salaries, but on looking at the details, which have just been handed to me by the clerk of the committee, I find that the increase for cadets is $5,000, while there is a decrease in extra compensation to officers of $1,000, so that there is only a net increase of $4,000, and that is entirely due to the increased number of cadets. There is not the slightest change or modification of the existing law. The Clerk read as follows:

For constructing a set of filter beds and connecting the same with the new reservoir and otherwise purifying the water, including all necessary appurtenances, to be immediately available, $40,000.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to propose any amendment unless it meets the approval of the gentleman from New York in charge of the bill, but I want to call attention to the fact that the report of the Board of Visitors is very full and exhaustive on this question of the water supply, and among other things the writer of the report says that he believes that a well and thoroughly writer of the report says that he believes that a well and thoroughly protected filter capable of containing 500,000 gallons could be constructed at West Point for about $25,000. The appropriation, therefore, makes an increase of $15,000 over the estimate in the report of the Board of Visitors, but I understand that the War Department's estimate is $40,000. Now, if it is possible to cut down this amount without injury to the Academy, it seems to me that the gentleman from New York in charge of the bill would do well to your to reduce this items from $40,000 to $25,000.

that the gentleman from New York in charge of the bill would do well to move to reduce this item from $40,000 to $25,000.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Hull] has correctly stated the matter, and perhaps as fully as it needs to be stated. This is a question which is attracting a great deal of attention among scientific men. The officers at the Academy and those at the War Department, after considering the subject, sent us an estimate of $40,000. One of the officers who acts in the capacity of an expert, being a physician, said that $25,000 would be sufficient for the purpose of making these changes. This is a question between the officer detailed to go there and the Secretary of War. If the amount appropriated now should not be enough, another Congress can make a further appropriation; and as there seems to be a desire on the part of my friend the chairman of the committee [Mr. Hull] to have this reduced, and as my friend from Missouri [Mr. Dockery] is looking anxiously for some modification of this bill which may counterbalance the $400 which has been given to old and experienced clerks, I will, to satisfy those gentlemen, ask that this appropriation be made $25,000 instead of $40,000. I move that amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 21, page 23, strike out "forty" and insert "twenty-five;" so as to make the amount $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill, the last paragraph being the following:

In all, for public buildings and grounds, $97,244.

Mr. FENTON. I move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After "dollars," in line 13, page 24, insert:
"Provided, That no sectarian church or chapel shall be erected upon the Government reservation at West Point."

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I hope that amendment will not be adopted—
Mr. McClellan. I make the point of order that the amendment embraces new legislation and can not be entertained. Mr. HULL. Before the Chair decides the point of order, I would like to ask a question—whether there is any legal authority under which any building not expressly provided for by law may be erected?

that this increase is due entirely, I believe, to the increase in the number of cadets.

Mr. BLUE. Then it does not result from any increases of salary?
Mr. CURTIS of New York. Not at all. We have simply recommended the appropriations required to carry out existing law.

Mr. BLUE. One other question. I notice that the provisions for additional pay occur in several places on page 3. Now, have those allowances been carried as permanent law all the time?

Mr. HULL. It is the law that when an officer is detailed for duty at the Academy he receives a certain amount of extra pay regardless of his rank. In some cases he may have the rank of major, in other cases he may have the rank of captain, but if he is a licutenant or any grade below that, he gets corresponding extra many years. And no sectarian religion is taught there under the direction of the Federal Government. I think the motion of my friend [Mr. Fenton] is entirely out of order. I submit that it should be rejected, either upon the point of order raised by my friend from New York [Mr. McClellan] that it is new legislation, or upon its merits.

Mr. BLUE. Before the Chair passes upon this question, I should like an explanation in regard to the appropriation provided for in the bill for "public building and grounds, $97,244." If any part of that appropriation is for erecting a church I think the amendment may be in order, as it would have the effect of limit-amendment may be in order, as it would have the effect of limiting the appropriation.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. My friend from Kansas [Mr. Blue] has referred to the provision in the bill, "For public buildings and grounds, $97,244," and asks whether any portion of that is to be used for the erection of a church. If he will turn back in this bill to page 19 he will find under the heading "Buildings and grounds," line 18, a specification of every improvement or modification contemplated in the way of public buildings and grounds. No work not there specified can be ordered by the Academy Board. Board.

Mr. BLUE. But the gentleman from New York [Mr. Curtis] is familiar with this bill, being a member of the committee; and I ask him to answer the question I have put. I have not found anything in the bill to indicate the answer. And I would like anything in the bill to indicate the answer. And I would like him to say squarely whether there is anything in this bill that provides for the erection or repair of a church building.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I have already said that there is no provision in this bill appropriating a single cent for the erection, improvement, or modification of a house for religious worship. There is no improvement of a chapel provided for, and there is none in contemplation. Is that a full answer to the gentleman's mostion?

Mr. BLUE. It is a full answer.
Mr. FENTON. I should like to know whether the Secretary of War has power to give permission for the erection of a building there to be used by any religious denomination.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. No, sir.
Mr. FENTON. He has no such power?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I am not aware there is any such ower. The Secretary of War simply administers the laws relating to the Army. This institution has been established by law, and certain provisions are made from time to time for the erection of buildings. Congress provides in each case for the erection of such buildings as may be desired. Outside of any such provision no one has authority to enter upon the grounds and erect any buildings whatever.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule on the point of order.

The Chair thinks that this is new legislation as here proposed, that it is obnoxious to the rule, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. BLUE. One more question, Mr. Chairman. I would like the gentleman from New York in charge of this bill to give us some light on the fifteen-thousand-dollar item in lines 1 and 2 on

Mr. CURTIS of New York. The gentleman refers to the lines beginning on page 23:

For laying a water main and appurtenances to connect the new reservoir with the existing system of water distribution, so as to afford an adequate fire pressure, to be immediately available, $15,000.

I will state to the gentleman from Kansas that there has been a reservoir erected upon the side of the mountain at some distance from the lower reservoir, and money is needed to connect the one with the other—that is to say, to connect this reservoir with the

with the other—that is to say, to connect this reservoir with the present fire apparatus at the post.

Mr. BLUE. Will it require that much?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. That is the estimate of the Secretary of War, it is the opinion of the Military Committee, and it is the opinion, and so stated, of the faculty of the Academy.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from New York that a change in one provision of the bill makes from New York that a change in one provision of the bill makes necessary a change in the aggregate.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I was going to suggest an amendment to correct that. It is a mere clerical matter.

There is an amendment that I will suggest, however, Mr. Chairman. It will be seen on pages 2, 3, 7, 9, 19, and elsewhere throughout the bill that a note is appended showing the amounts appropriated last year. This was only done for the convenience of the committee in considering the bill, and I move that those words be stricken out wherever they occur in the bill.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, a word or two about the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Fenton]. Of course, it is entirely out, but in reference to the bill I want to be heard for a few moments.

My understanding is that the Military Academy grounds, being public property, are not open to the erection of any buildings other than those existing, or which may hereafter be provided by law. I am aware of the fact that there is a rumor or a newspaper report am aware of the fact that there is a rumor or a newspaper report to the effect that one denomination has had permission granted to it to erect a church on the Academy grounds, independently of the action of the Government in reference to the matter. I do not know anything as to the truth of the assertion. I think, however, know anything as to the truth of the assertion. I think, however, that such a statement, which has received currency throughout the newspapers, is the motive which prompted the gentleman from Ohio in offering the amendment. But if this be a fact, if such authority has been granted, I believe it is a consent made yb the officers of the Government that is entirely unauthorized by law, and that the Congress of the United States, when it knows that such a thing has been done, should pass some sort of an indethat such a thing has been done, should pass some sort of an independent bill, or a provision not on an appropriation bill, to make it impossible in the future. If one denomination can enter upon the grounds at the Military Academy and erect a church, other denominations in the United States can have and will have a perfect right to claim the same privilege, and you will have diverted from the public purposes for which it was contemplated this reservation.

reservation.

I do not suppose it is contended that anybody who goes to the Academy must belong to the church maintained there by the Government, although, if I understand it, no sectarian doctrines whatever are taught. But certainly this ought to be true—that the religious instruction provided by the Government on public reservations should be of such character that it would not injure reservations should be of such character that it would not injure anyone, no matter what may be his religious beliefs, who is desirous of such instruction. And, for my part, I wish to take this time and occasion to say that if the Secretary of War, as a mere executive officer of the Government, has by order given authority to any denomination to erect a church edifice at West Point, in my judgment he has exceeded his authority, and the Congress of the United States should take prompt action when officially notified of the fact.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the committee will consider the motion I have made to strike out the lines to which I referred, I believe that will complete the consideration

The motion of Mr. Curtis of New York to strike out the lines indicated by him was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I move that the committee rise and report the bill as amended favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Hepburn reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the Military Academy appropriation bill, had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, and as so amended to recommend its passage.

The amendments recommended by the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed. On motion of Mr. CURTIS of New York, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table

WILLIAM B. ELLIS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 2259) for the relief of William B. Ellis, with a Senate amendment thereto.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF ARMY OFFICERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 3719) to provide for the appointment by brevet of active or retired officers of the United States Army, with a Senate amendment thereto.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Speaker, I would inquire if that bill is intended to in any way give additional compensation to anybody by reason of that brevet rank? In the form in which it is read I can not tell. I shall be glad to have the gentleman who is in charge of the bill

I shall be glad to have the gentleman who is in charge of the bill enlighten us upon that subject.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I have not this bill in charge, nor am I aware what member of the committee did have charge of it, but I can answer the question of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Blue] by saying that it makes no provision for an increase of compensation, or an expenditure of money in connection with the carrying out of any of the provisions of the

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I think I will move that that bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as the gentleman who has it in charge is not here.

Mr. BLUE. I think it ought to go there.

The motion of Mr. Hull to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs was agreed to.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 1261) for the relief of John Kehl, and to restore him to his former rating, with Senate amendments thereto.

The Senate amendments were read. Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

THE DEATH PENALTY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 878) to reduce the cases in which the death penalty may be inflicted, with a Senate amendment thereto.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

PATRICK RAINEY

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 2328) for the relief of Patrick Rainey, with a Senate amendment thereto. The Senate amendment was concurred in.

MARGARET A. KIDWELL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 3113) granting a pension to Margaret A. Kidwell, with a Senate amendment thereto.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

GEORGE W. TAYLOR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H.R. 6608) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of George W. Taylor, with a Senate amendment thereto.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to lay before the House a request for a change of reference. The Committee on the District of Columbia ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 2237) providing for the appointment of a guardian for pensioners in certain cases in the District of Columbia, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

There was no objection.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. This finishes the business on the Speaker's table. The next thing in order is the call of committees. The call rests with the Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

The Clerk proceeded to call the committees.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, as the members of the House have nearly all gone away on the theory that the appropriation bills would take up the afternoon, I move that the House do now ad-

Mr. LINNEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask unanimous consent to have a pension bill passed?

Mr. HULL. Oh, certainly, if the gentleman desires to pass a particular bill, but I know the chairmen of committees have nearly all gone away. Mr. LINNEY. Mr. Speaker-

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa withdraw his motion?

Mr. HULL. I withdraw my motion.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed with the call of committees. The Chair desired to call the committees because there were one or two matters, like bridge bills, etc., that the Chair thought could be passed.

Mr. HULL. I have no desire to interfere with the business of the House, and my only idea was that gentlemen who have left the Hall of the House would feel that they had been deceived by the fact that their committees were called during their absence, they supposing that the consideration of the appropriation bill would consume the remainder of the day. If the Speaker desires it, I will withdraw the motion, because I have no desire to inter-

BANKING AND CURRENCY.

Mr. HILL (when the Committee on Banking and Currency was called). Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to ask that the committee be passed without prejudice, in order that it may be called up at some other time, without losing its place on the call? I know that the committee desires to call up two measures on the first call of the committee, but the gentlemen in charge of them are absent at this time.

The SPEAKER. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. HILL. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking and Currency be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking and Currency be passed without INSPECTION OF SMALL CRAFTS PROPELLED BY GASOLINE, ETC.

Mr. BENNETT (when the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was called). Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S.1846) providing for certain requirements for vessels propelled by gas, fluid, naphtha, or electric motors.

gas, fluid, naphtha, or electric motors.

Be it enacted, etc. That all vessels of above 15 tons burden, carrying freight or passengers for hire, propelled by gas, fluid, naphtha, or electric motors, shall be, and are hereby, made subject to all the provisions of section 4426 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the inspection of hulls and boilers and requiring engineers and pilots; and all vessels so propelled, without regard to tonnage or use, shall be subject to the provisions of section 442 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the regulation of steam vessels in passing each other; and to so much of sections 423 and 423 of the Revised Statutes, relating to lights, fog signals, steering, and sailing rules, as the Board of Supervising Inspectors shall, by their regulations, deem applicable and practicable for their safe navigation.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield?
Mr. BENNETT. Yes, sir.
Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Is this bill agreeable to the builders of naphtha launches at Morris Dock, New York?
Mr. BENNETT. I understand so.
Mr. BARTLETT of New York. And is it agreeable to private owners?

Mr. BENNETT. It is generally agreeable to all that I have heard from.

heard from.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Is there no objection to it?

Mr. BENNETT. None that I know of. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the report from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on this bill be printed as a portion of my remarks.

The report (by Mr. Bennett) is as follows:

The report (by Mr. Bennett) is as ioliows:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4242) requiring small craft to comply with certain regulations of the Treasury Department, report that they have accepted Senate bill 1648 as a substitute for the House bill.

The Senate bill provides for the protection of navigation to an extent rendered necessary, in the opinion of your committee, by the large increase in the number of small craft on the waters of the United States. It provides that vessels run for hire above 15 tons burden shall be subject to inspection by the Treasury Department, and requires compliance with section 4428 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and further, that all vessels propelled by machinery of whatever tonnage shall obey all the rules of the road as required by section 4412, relating to steam vessels in passing each other, and so much of sections 4233 and 4234 of the Revised-Statutes, relating to lights, fog signals, steering, and salling rules, as the Board of Supervising Inspectors shall, by their regulations, deem applicable and practicable for safe navigation.

Your committee have authorized a favorable report on the bill, requesting enactment into law for the benefit and protection of navigation.

The Supervising Inspector of Steam Vessels in the letter attached presents the facts forcibly and fully:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SUPERVISING INSPECTOR-GENERAL, Washington, D. C., February 1, 1896.

Washington, D. C., February 1, 1896.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, by reference to this office for report, of a communication from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, House of Representatives, inclosing bill H. R. 4242, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session, "To amend section 4426, Title Lill, Revised Statutes, requiring ferryboats, canal boats, yachts, and other small craft of like character propelled by gasoline, gas fluid, naphtha, or motive power, to be inspected under the provision of this title," requesting the honorable the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish the committee with such suggestions as he may deem proper "touching the merits of the bill and the propriety of its passage."

I have the honor to report thereon that the bill referred to purposes to bring within the law vessels propelled by motor power other than steam, namely, "gasoline, gas fluid, naphtha, or motive power." If amended to include all vessels propelled by machinery, which would include electricity, evidently inadvertently omitted in the bill, it would meet the entire approval of this office. At present the class of vessels referred to are, except on the Great Lakes, "free lances," entirely exempt from all laws governing steam or sail vessels, and because of the absence of any law governing them they frequently endanger themselves as well as the vessels that are navigated under lawful rules and regulations.

Respectfully, yours,

JAS. A. DUMONT,
Supervising Inspector-General.

JAS. A. DUMONT, Supervising Inspector-General.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. PARKER. My colleague from New Jersey [Mr. GARD-NER] takes an interest in this question. Does he know that it is to be called up?

Mr. BENNETT. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARD-NER] understood that this bill was to be brought up at the first opportunity.

Mr. PARKER. Does he object to it now?

Mr. BENNETT. I will say for the information of the gentleman from New Jersey, that I have talked the matter over with the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Does the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER] give his formal adherence to the bill now?

Mr. BENNETT. On the last occasion this bill was up the gentleman from New Hampshire asked me the same question, and I replied at that time that I had submitted it to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER] and that he had given his consent

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Will the gentleman allow me one question? Was not this bill objected to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS]?

Mr. BENNETT. No, sir; not that I remember.

Mr. CUMMINGS. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state that when the bill was last up I made objection to it. On returning to New York I consulted with the men whose interests were affected by it, and they told me that they were perfectly satisfied. I withdraw my objection, and shall vote for the bill.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BENNETT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE BETWEEN NEW YORK CITY AND LONG ISLAND.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9865) extending the time for the completion of the bridge across the East River, between the city of New York and Long Island, now in course of construction, as authorized by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1887.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for the completion of the bridge of the New York and Long Island Bridge Company across the East River, between the city of New York and Long Island, authorized by the act of Congress entitled "An act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the East River, between the city of New York and Long Island." approved March 3, 1887, and the various acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, is hereby extended to and including the 1st day of January, in the year 1902.

Mr. BENNETT. As a portion of my remarks, I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. BENNETT) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9865) "extending the time for the completion of the bridge across the East River between the city of New York and Long Island, now in course of construction, as authorized by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1887," submit the following favorable report:

The construction of this important bridge (commonly called the Blackwells Island Bridge) was begun as required by the act of Congress, and has been continued to this date, excepting for the time during which the condemnation proceedings for the right of way were under consideration in the courts of the State of New York.

Two of the main piers in the East River have been built and completed and another is in course of construction. The company has condemned or purchased and paid for much of the land necessary for the right of way. The company has acted in good faith throughout, and promises prompt and diligent prosecution of the work, and has the means necessary to meet the costs of the same.

The committee suggest that the bill be amended by striking out the words of the same.

The committee suggest that the bill be amended by striking out the words "and two," in line 12 of the bill, thus curtailing by two years the extension, and as thus amended your committee feel justified in approving the bill and recommending its passage at the present session of Congress, as without such action the rights of the company, as granted by the Government, will expire on the 3d day of March ensuing, and great pecuniary loss will result to those who have furnished the capital for the construction of the bridge.

The following report of the Chief of Engineers of the War Department was submitted to the House of Representatives when the bill was originally considered, and is annexed to this report for its information:

Office of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, Washington, D. C., December 22, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith H. R. 19044, a bill "authorizing the construction of a bridge across the East River, between the city of New York and Long Island," and to invite attention to the following copy of the report of the Board of Engineers for Fortifications and for River and Harbor Improvements, to whom it was referred.

The views of the Board are concurred in by this office.

"Office Board of Engineers, Army Building, "New York, December 17, 1886.

"Respectfully referred to the Chief of Engineers.

"The Board of Engineers has carefully considered the Senate and House bills 'authorizing the construction of a bridge across the East River between the city of New York and Long Island,' and have the honor to report that a bridge joining the city of New York and Long Island City, crossing the channels at about right angles near the middle of Blackwells Island, having its piers or abutments on the land side of the harbor lines of the East River, and a clear elevation of its lower chord, 150 feet above mean high water, at the middle of each channel of the river, and no part of the lower chord of the channel span less 142 feet above mean high water, will not 'obstruct, impair, or injuriously modify the navigation of the river,' as provided by said bridge.

"On behalf of the Board.

"THOMAS LINCOLN CASEY, "Colonel of Engineers, President of Board."

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ent servant,
J. C. DUANE,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Engineers.

Hon. WILLIAM C. ENDICOTT, Secretary of War.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Do I understand from the gentleman that the bill authorizing the construction of the bridge was passed in

Mr. BENNETT. The act authorizing the construction of this bridge was approved March 3, 1887.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, that has been nine years, and do I understand that no steps have been taken toward completing the bridge?

Mr. BENNETT. Yes, sir; several hundred thousand dollars have been expended in construction. The piers on either side of the river are completed, but in consequence of the enormous undertaking it has been impossible to finish the structure. The president of the Long Island road, Mr. Austin Corbin, was suddenly killed last spring, and as he had conducted the affairs of the road for a number of years, after his death it was impossible to carry the work forward and complete the bridge within the time required by the act of Congress, and an extension is therefore asked.

Mr. RICHARDSON. This extension, as I gather it from the

mr. RICHARDSON. This extension, as I gather it from the reading, was to 1902—five years later.

Mr. BENNETT. To 1900. There is an amendment offered to the bill by the committee. If the bill was read "1902," the amendment of the committee makes it 1900.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is the bill unanimously reported by the committee:

Mr. BENNETT. The bill is unanimously reported by the committee. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered on the bill and amendment, and under the operation thereof the amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to, and the bill as amended ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BENNETT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the call of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce be suspended temporarily.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

RECEIVERS OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS (when the Committee on Banking and Currency was called). Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Banking and Currency to call up House bill No. 1708, to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the appointment of receivers of national banks, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1876, as amended by an act approved August 3, 1892.

The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3 of an act entitled "An act authorizing the appointment of receivers of national banks, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1876, as amended by an act approved August 3, 1892, be, and hereby is, amended so as to read as follows:

"Seu. 3. That whenever any association shall have been or shall be placed in the hands of a receiver, as provided in section 5234 and other sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and when, as provided in section 5236 thereof, the Comptroller of the Currency shall have paid to each and every creditor of such association, not including shareholders who are creditors of such association, whose claim or claims as such creditor shall have been proved or allowed as therein prescribed, the full amount of such claims, and all expenses of the receivership and the redemption of the circulating notes of such association shall have been provided for by depositing lawful money of the United States with the Treasurer of the United States, the Comptroller of the Currency shall call a meeting of the shareholders of such association by giving notice thereof for thirty days in a newspaper published in the town, city, or county where the business of such association was carried on, or if no newspaper is there published, in the newspaper published in the town city, or county where the business of such association was carried on, or whether an agent shall be lected for that purpose, and in so determing the said shareholders shall wind up the affairs of such association, or whether an agent shall be lected for that purpose, and in so determining the said shareholders shall vote by ballot, in person or by proxy, each share of stock entitling the holder to one vote, and the majority of the stock in value and number of shares shall be necessary to determine whether the said receiver shall be continued, or whether an agent shall be continued, the said receiver shall be continued, or whether an agent shall be continued, the

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I ask for the reading of the report. The report (by Mr. VAN VOORHIS) was read, as follows:

The report (by Mr. VAN VOORHIS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Banking and Currency, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1708) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the appointment of receivers of national banks, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1876, submit the following report:

By the law with reference to the winding up of the affairs of broken national banks, as amended in 1892, full provision was made for the distribution of assets among creditors in satisfaction of their claims, and the appointment of an agent by the shareholders to act for them in distributing whatever might be left after claims were satisfied. There is, however, no provision for the case of the failure to serve, death, etc., of the agent appointed, and instances have already occurred where, on account of the death of the agent first named, there has resulted great embarrassment and delay in distribution of the remnant left to which the shareholders are entitled. The same reasons which justify the appointment of an agent in the first place, instead of relegating the shareholders to the jurisdiction of the courts of equity, are equally strong for the appointment of a successor to an agent whose service ceases before the fulfillment of his duties.

The bill herewith reported reenacts section 3 of the act of June 30, 1876, as amended by the act of August 3, 1892, with an amendment providing for the selection of a successor to the agent first named, in case the latter shall refuse to serve, die, resign, or be removed.

Your committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. VAN VOORHIS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

NATIONAL BANKS IN SMALL TOWNS.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Committee on Banking and Currency, I call up the bill (H. R. 7210) to amend section 5138 of the Revised Statutes, to provide for the organization of national banks in towns of not exceeding 3,000 inhabitants

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5138 of the Revised Statutes is hereby so amended as to read as follows:

"SEC. 5138. No association shall be organized with a less capital than $100,000, except that banks with a capital of not less than $50,000 may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, be organized in any place the population of which does not exceed 6,000 inhabitants; and except that banks with a capital of not less than $25,000 may, with the sanction of the Secretary of the Treasury, be organized in any place the population of which does not exceed $,000 inhabitants. No association shall be organized in a city the population of which exceeds 50,000 persons with a capital of less than $20,000."

The report (by Mr. Van Voorhis) was read, as follows:

The report (by Mr. VAN VOORHIS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Banking and Currency, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7210) to amend section 5138 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to provide for the organization of national banks in towns not exceeding 3,000 inhabitants, submit the following report:
Under the existing law the minimum capital stock required for the organization of a national bank is $50,000. In some sections of the country there has been a growing need for bank issues as well as for other banking accommodations in small towns in which the amount of $50,000 can not readily be raised for banking purposes. The inequality in the distribution of national banks is one of the marked features of our national banking system. In the Eastern and Middle States banks are abundant, and this alteration in the law would not be availed of to any considerable extent. But in the Western and Southern States there is a dearth of banks in many sections, due no doubt to the lack of capital in those sections.

The following statement illustrates the situation:

Statement of banks, bank stock, and bank circulation in the States named.

State.	Number of banks.	Bank stock.	Bank cir- culation.
Massachusetts Pennsylvania New York Ohio Illinois Indiana New Jersey Iowa North Carolina South Carolina Georgia Florida Alabama Mississippi Louisiana Arkansas	268 412 334 248 220 114 102 168 27 16 29 18 26 10 21	$97,017,500 74,233,129 87,136,060 45,645,338 38,696,000 14,372,000 14,385,000 13,510,000 1,918,000 1,918,000 3,666,000 1,485,000 3,565,000 3,755,000 3,735,000 1,220,000	$31, 511, 706 27, 609, 870 35, 623, 522 15, 714, 986 7, 322, 015 5, 521, 096 4, 966, 527 3, 865, 399 830, 067 540, 473 1, 143, 504 388, 688 1, 206, 823 1, 349, 892 279, 916

It thus appears that a marked discrepancy exists in the bank circulation and accommodations in the different sections of the country. This inequality may be remedied, in part at least, and the existing need met to some extent in the sections where there is a dearth of bank issues and banks are so remote from each other as to afford grossly inadequate accommodations. Relief of this character has been recommended by those best qualified to judge, and meets the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, who is most familiar with the banking needs of the country.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill, with the following amendments:

lowing amendments:
In line 11 strike out the word "five," making it read "$20,000;" and in line 14 strike out the word "three" and insert "four," making it read "4,000 inhabitants."

Amend the title of the bill by striking out the word "three" in the last line and inserting the word "four," so as to make it read "4,000 inhabitants."

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been very carefully considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency and unanimously reported by that committee. I am not aware of any opposition to the bill from any section of the country. The South and West are desirous of having it passed for the purpose of increasing their banking facilities. I think it is within the observation of all who have carefully looked at the situation that the need of additional banking facilities in those sections is pressing with extreme urgency and ought to be met as far as it is in our power without jeopardizing the currency of other sections of the Union or impairing the general banking interests of the country, in which all our citizens have a stake. That we may have a view of the conditions with which we have to reckon in devising a means of relief for the suffering sections, I have prepared some tabulated statements illustrating the diverse conditions existing in different sections of our country and which I believe create a real difficulty in the way of making any uniform system of banking equally efficacious in all parts of the Union. These conditions relate to area, population, resources, capital, industries, production, currency, and banking as they are found in the different sections of our country.

The first table shows the area, population, personal property, real property, farm lands, farm products, mortgages, average rate of interest, manufactured products, wages of employees in manuof interest, manufactured products, wages of employees in manufacturing, silver product, and savings-bank depositors in the several States of the Union. The second table shows the number of national banks, capital stock, bonds to secure circulation, bank-note circulation, individual deposits, loans and discounts, money due by national banks, State banks, and reserve agents, and stocks and securities held by the national banks in each State.

stocks and securities held by the national banks in each State.

For the purpose of the comparison, I have classified the States as McKinley States and Bryan States, embracing, of course, in the former class all that gave their vote in the recent election for McKinley, and in the latter all that voted for Mr. Bryan. This mode of classification is adopted for convenience only and not for the purpose of appealing to political feeling, for on the money question there can be no politics. There is, however, a coincidence worthy of notice, that the States which voted for Bryan are those in which the greatest need for additional banking facilities is supposed to exist. This fact suggested the mode of classification adopted.

A brief statement will bring into more distinct view the conditions which these tables reveal. It shows that the McKinley States have in round numbers 35 and the Bryan States 65 per cent of the total area, while in population the ratio is substantially reversed, the McKinley States having 64 and the Bryan States 36 per cent of the total.

In school expenditures the McKinley States rise to 78 and the Bryan States fall to 22 per cent of the total. In the former the per capita expenditure for education is $2.71, and in the latter $1.37.

Of personal property the McKinley States possess 68 and the Bryan States 32 per cent of the total. Of real property the former hold 76 and the latter 24 per cent of the total. Of farm lands the McKinley States have 71 and the Bryan States 29 per cent of the total is relied.

Of farm products the McKinley States produce 60 and the Bryan States 40 per cent of the total product. Of real-estate mortgages the McKinley States are burdened with 81 and the Bryan States with 19 per cent of the total incumbrance. Of manufactured products the McKinley States produce 87 and the Bryan States 13 per cent of the total product. Of the wages paid labor in manufacturing the McKinley States pay 88 and the Bryan States 12 per cent of the total wage paid. In silver product the Bryan States are far in the lead, producing 98 and the McKinley States but 2 per cent of the total product. In number of savings-bank depositors the McKinley States show over 98 and the Bryan States less than 2 per cent of the whole number, reversing the ratio in the case of silver.

It must be admitted that these are most pregnant facts and are of the profoundest significance in the consideration of the banking and currency question and its bearing upon those sections of the Union which exhibit such marked inferiority in all the elements which constitute the basis of modern economy in the mechanism of commercial exchange.

It is not my purpose at this time to submit any reasoning from the conditions I have brought into view. Every member of this House will be sensible enough of the influence they must exert upon the problem of supplying currency and credit to communities so deficient in the very breath of life to fiscal institutions. It is not to be expected that communities comparatively weak in the material resources which must precede banking facilities can maintain a banking system suitable to stronger, more developed, wealthy, and populous sections any more than we can expect the feebleness of childhood or the decreptude of age to admit of the regimen suitable to the vigor of mature manhed. Banks can not regimen suitable to the vigor of mature manhood. Banks can not be maintained where there is no banking to do; credit money is unavailable where credit does not exist; but these will grow up in every community just as fast as material development, capital, wealth, and business require them.

This table presents the banking situation in all sections of the This table presents the banking stuation in all sections of the Union and reveals in some the weakness which comes from the lack of nourishment. With sparse population, limited capital, small resources in wealth and production, and a limited use of the instruments of economy in finance there will be in the nature of things inferior facilities for conducting commercial exchange. What we would expect from an a priori view is precisely what we find in the banking statement to which I have directed your attention. A brief recapitulation will help us to a realization of the meaning of the figures contained in Table II.

This exhibit shows that the McKinley States contain 75 and the the meaning of the figures contained in Table II.

This exhibit shows that the McKinley States contain 75 and the Bryan States but 25 per cent of the total number of national banks. Of the capital stock the McKinley States have 83 and the Bryan States 17 per cent of the total. Of bonds deposited to secure circulation the McKinley States have 89 and the Bryan States 11 per cent of the total. Of bank-note circulation the McKinley States have 88 and the Bryan States 12 per cent of the total. Of individual deposits the McKinley States have 85 and the Bryan States 15 per cent of the total. Of loans and discounts the McKinley States have 91 and the Bryan States 9 per cent of the total. Of the money due from national and State banks and from reserve agents the McKinley States have between 80 and 85 and the Bryan States and McKinley States have between 80 and 85 and from reserve agents the McKinley States have between 80 and 85 and the Bryan States an average of about 20 per cent of the total. Of the stocks and securities held by the banks the McKinley States have 87 and the Bryan States 13 per cent of the total.

But a glance at these percentages will show how completely they conform to those in Table I, demonstrating that banks will exist were they are most needed and will multiply in proportion to the means of greating them and the need for their means of greating them and the need for their means.

means of creating them and the need for their use.

Now, let me, in the way of an object lesson, submit an illustration of the disparity of banking benefits enjoyed in different sections on account of differences in the conditions under which banking operations are carried on.

Lancaster County, Pa., which constitutes the Tenth Congres sional district of Pennsylvania, contains an area of less than 1,000 square miles and has a population of about 150,000. It is an agricultural county, containing 500,000 acres of cultivated land divided into 9,000 farms which are assessed at nearly $90,000,000. Its agricultural product in 1890 was $7,657,790, exceeding by at least 25 per cent that of any other county in the Union. Its people have $21,500,000 invested in indements and mortgages. If here 26 re-$21,500,000 invested in judgments and mortgages. It has 26 national banks, with a capital stock of $3,650,000 and a note circulation of $1,087,430. No citizen in the county need travel from his resiof $1,087,430. No citizen in the county need travel from his residence more than 12 miles at most to a national bank, where he can obtain all the accommodations he needs if he possesses the necessary collaterals.

The following table exhibits the banking situation in that county on October 6, 1896:

I now present, in order to bring the contrast fully into view, a corresponding statement of the banking situation in the seven Southern States named.

In the foregoing comparison we see side by side two agricultural sections of our country—one a single county, with an area of 973 square miles, with a population of 150,000 and one Representative in Congress; the other, seven sovereign States, with an average area of 48,985 square miles, an average population of 1,225,524, and an average representation in Congress of seven members. The result of the comparison shows that the former area, limited in extent and population as it is, has 37 per cent more banks, 65 per per cent more capital stock, 140 per cent more bonds deposited for circulation, 100 per cent more circulating notes, 36 per cent more individual deposits, and 57 per cent more loans and discounts than the average number and amounts in the States embraced in the latter extended area

The conditions which account for such disparity in banking facilities as are revealed in the foregoing comparison are conspicuous factors in the problem of national banking. They render impossible of attainment the proposal of some enthusiastic curinposation. rency reformers, viz, a banking system which will furnish equal rency reformers, viz, a banking system which will furmish equal facilities to and make credit equally available in all portions of the country and distribute the Ioanable capital of the country so as to meet the needs of all sections. This might be possible in a country of more homogeneous conditions than ours, but here and now it is one of the "iridescent dreams" of financial Utopia, for distribution and the property is a similar and applying the property is a similar and the country side in the country sends to be a similar and the country side in the country side in the country side in the country side is similar and the country side in the country side is similar and side is side is side in the country side is side i dissimilar conditions will never yield similar or equal results in banking any more than in other realms. The best we can do will be an approximation to this ideal; to so amend our system as to secure the least of the worst and the most of the best results of a uniform national banking system. That such a scheme will be evolved in due time out of the chaos of suggestions submitted, I do not doubt. It will not be done, however, in mass meeting, but by the deliberate and painstaking action of the Committee on Banking and Currency of Congress, aided by the best light, the latest thought they can obtain on the subject. The bill before the House is an important step in that direction, and its passage will afford no inconsiderable relief in the sections of the country where the need is greatest.

In conclusion, I submit the following observations from the last report of the Comptroller of the Currency. They leave no doubt of the wisdom of this bill.

ORGANIZATION OF NATIONAL BANKS WITH A LESS CAPITAL STOCK THAN

The national banking system was for many years protested against by those who looked upon its creation by national statute as an innovation of the rights reserved to the States under the provision of the Federal Constitution. Whether or not the prejudice against the system upon that ground has yielded through the decision of the Supreme Court upholding the constitutionality of the law, or for other reasons, the fact is that throughout the whole country whatever complaint is now urged against it is placed upon a different basis. It has drawn to itself support and inspired general confidence because of its central and uniform governmental supervision and examination, the frequent publica-tion of sworn reports of condition, the double liability of share-holders, the percentage of reserve to be held against deposits required, and the necessity of having the bank's funds invested in quick assets rather than tied up in real-estate investments. features have been the means of giving it a strength beyond any State system, and guarantee its future continuance. Its usefulness, however, can still be enlarged and its benefits to the people made more widespread.

The complaint to-day is mainly directed against it because the minimum capital stock required is so large that small towns and villages can not have the banking advantage which, if less capital were required, they might and would. The allegation laid is not without force, argument, and reason. In many sections of the country under existing requirements national banks, though needed, can not be supported from a want of surplus investable capital necessary to establish them. These places suffer more for want of banks of deposit and discount than from any need of banks of isone but radar areadonants. banks of issue, but under amendments 6 and 7, to which attention is called, either banks of issue, deposit, and discount or banks of deposit and discount alone could be had.

The minimum capital stock required at present for the organization of a national bank is $50,000, with a deposit with the Treasurer of the United States of United States bonds of $12,500. The proposed reduction of capital stock to $25,000, with a proportionate reduction in the amount of bonds to be deposited with the Treasurer, in places of less than 2,000 inhabitants, would give independent banks of issue to communities in the South and independent banks of issue to communities in the South and West which, owing to the conditions surrounding them, can not take from their daily business needs a greater sum and invest in banking. The result is that they are deprived both of the use of foreign and local capital and the utilizing of their own credits. The safety of banking upon a reduced capital stock in such localities would be not less than that which attaches at present in larger cities and towns upon a greater capital stock. State banks are, under proper regulations and safeguards, conducted upon the basis of a small capital and, with the methods of examinations employed and the requirements exacted, there is no reason to the basis of a small capital and, with the methods of examinations employed and the requirements exacted, there is no reason to believe that banks in the national system would be less safe. It would be far better for depositors in all towns and villages of limited population if officers and directors of national banks had dividends to pay upon but half of fifty thousand of capital instead of upon the whole amount. It would lessen the hazarding of loans upon uncertainties in order to make a profit which can not be legitimately earned, and therefore diminish the number of resultant failures.

The enabling of these communities to have national banks would bring them in touch with those portions of the country where bring them in touch with those portions of the country where there is a surplus of investable capital. For many years this capi-tal has been invested in other States, largely in national-bank stocks; and it has thus come about that facilities for commercial exchange have been afforded many places where local capital could not be furnished for the purpose, and the loanable capital needed increased, with the effect of lowering rates of interest beyond those previously prevailing. In evidence of the extent of this investment it was shown by an investigation made in 1889 that nearly one-third of the capital stock of 520 national banks in Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska had been con-tributed by Northern and Eastern shareholders, while in Dakota, tributed by Northern and Eastern snareholders, while in Dakota, Idaho, Montana, New Mexico, Utah, Washington, Wyoming, and Arizona more than one-half of that of 144 national banks was held by nonresident shareholders. In the States of Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Kentucky, and Tennessee, of the shares of 410 national banks a little more than one-sixth of the total was held by nonresidents. The investments of this character made by nonresidents since the date given, and especially so during the years from 1890 to 1892, have been at least especially so during the years from 1890 to 1892, have been at least as large, if not larger, than in the years prior, but the figures are not at hand to state with accuracy the proportion. The facts alluded to, however, form of themselves such data upon the point made as to make them worthy of consideration.

Mr. McCLELLAN. May I ask the gentleman whether this bill has been submitted to the Comptroller of the Currency?

Mr. BROSIUS. Oh, yes, and he warmly recommends it.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to me a moment

resultant failures

Mr. BROSIUS. Certainly.
Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, the whole object of this bill lies in be prudent.

this—and this is the only important point in it—that it gives to the people of small towns an opportunity to organize national banks upon a capital of less than $50,000. I have never been able to see why national banks with twenty thousand or twenty-five thousand dollars capital could not well be organized to suit the convenience of small communities, just as well as banks with $50,000 capital or more. The whole object of this bill, I say, is to give small towns an opportunity, under the regulations that exist in relation to national banks, to organize banks with less than $50,000 capital, and I can not see any objection to it.

Mr. LACEY. With the existing law modified as this bill proposes, what capital is required in towns from eight to twelve thousand.

poses, what capital is required in towns from eight to twelve thousand population?

Mr. BROSIUS. Fifty thousand dollars.
Mr. LACEY. The bill says that a capital of not less than $50,000 shall be required for any national bank organized in a place with a population not exceeding 6,000.
Mr. VAN VOORHIS. One hundred thousand dollars is required for a place of eight or ten thousand inhabitants.

Mr. LACEY. Then the existing law is not changed in that respect?

Mr. COX. Not at all.

Mr. BROSIUS. This bill does not change existing law as to towns of more than 6,000 inhabitants.

Mr. LACEY. Why would it not be right to extend that 6,000 limit to places of 10,000 or 15,000 population?
Mr. BROSIUS. Oh, do not change the existing law in that

Mr. LACEY. It is all very well to say "Do not do it," but why ot? A town of 6,000 inhabitants or less, provided the population is not less than 4,000, can have a fifty-thousand-dollar bank, and if it is less than 4,000 it can have a twenty-thousand-dollar bank, while a town of 6,500 must have a one-hundred-thousand-dollar bank. There is too much difference between the requirements of the law as to towns of very nearly the same size and importance.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire of the gentleman in charge of this bill if the committee considered the question whether it might be wise to limit the articles of association to ten years, or to a less period, where these banks are organized on a small capital?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I will say to the gentleman that that was not the intention.

Mr. GROUT. Well, now that the matter is brought to the gentleman's attention, does he not think that as a prudent step it might be well not to give a bank with small capital so long a life as twenty years, but to limit it to ten years? At the end of ten years it could reorganize and could probably then be able to take a larger capital. Twenty years is the longest life a bank can have under existing law.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I do not think it would be advisable to create in this way two classes of banks. I do not know any reason why there should be such a limitation to time as the gentleman

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT] yield for a question?

Mr. GROUT. Certainly.

Mr. COX. Why does the gentleman propose to put restrictions upon small banks different from those imposed upon larger banks?

Mr. GROUT. Twenty thousand dollars is a very small capital for a bank. A bank with no larger capital would be understood to be a very weak institution.

Mr. COX. I do not know as to that.

Mr. GROUT. Certainly it would be, so far as capitalization is concerned. Now, to say that a bank with $20,000 capital shall that a bank with $20,000 capital shall start on a career of twenty years is quite different from saying that a bank of $50,000 capital shall do so.

Mr. COX. If in any given town or locality a bank with so large a capital as $50,000 could not be organized, does the gentleman think it would be right to exclude such locality from the privileges proposed when they might organize with a capital of $20,000?

Mr. GROUT. I would not exclude them; I would admit them.
But my individual opinion is that the life of a bank with so small a capital as $20,000 should be limited to ten years, at the end of which time it might reorganize, very probably with a larger cap-

Mr. COX. Do you want to squeeze out the small fellows because they can not get up to the amount of capital that some others can raise?

Mr. GROUT. I am making no proposition to "squeeze out the small fellows;" I propose to admit them and give them a fair start on their career. But it seems to me only right to provide that where a bank organizes with so small a capital it shall not run for so long a time as ten years without coming to a settlement. In an organization of banks with so small a capital as $20,000, I think such a proposition as I suggest—a limitation of ten years—would

Mr. COX. I differ with the gentleman. Mr. KIEFER. Can not any bank under the present law wind

Mr. KIEFER. Can not any bank under the present law wind up its affairs at any time?

Mr. GROUT. But under such a provision as I propose—fixing a limitation of ten years—a bank with this small capital would be compelled to wind up at the end of the ten years; whereas, otherwise it might run on and at the end of twenty years might be found to be utterly unsound, and that might be because of the small amount of the capital. When a bank has a capital of, say, $100,000 to meet deposits the case is different. But without the limitation I suggest, a bank with only $20,000 capital might take as large a sum in deposits as an institution with larger capital, and would have nothing with which to meet those deposits except its small capital and the small reserve set aside for that purpose.

I do not wish to prolong this discussion; but it seems to me such a provision as I suggest should commend itself as a sound financial a provision as I suggest should commend itself as a sound financial measure. With such an amendment it appears to me this bill measure. With such an amendment it appears to me this bill would meet more hearty and general approval.

Mr. COX. Right there allow me to ask the gentleman why the little banks should be put under a ten-years limitation and the large banks under a longer limitation?

Mr. GROUT. I have stated fully the reason for it, but if the friends of the bill are opposed to it, as they seem to be, I shall not force the proposition in the form of an amendment, though I think it the part of prudence to bring the affairs of a twenty-thousand capitalization to a settlement at the end of ten years at

A MEMBER. What is the ordinary limit with the larger banks?
Mr. GROUT. Twenty years. But, Mr. Speaker, as I have said, I will not submit any amendment.
Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I now call for the previous question.
The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments reported by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed. The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment to the title, as reported by the committee, will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. VAN VOORHIS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Speaker, I alluded some time ago to some figures which I would like to add to my remarks upon the bill just disposed of. I ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman will have unanimous consent to extend his remarks.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. There is another bill which I have been Mr. VAN VOORHIS. There is another bill which I have been instructed by the committee to bring before the House; but by reason of the absence of the chairman of the committee, who desires to be heard on the bill, I will ask that the committee be passed temporarily without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks that the committee be again passed without prejudice. Is there objection? The Chair bears rope.

Mr. BENNETT (when the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was called). Mr. Speaker, I ask that this committee be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNETT] asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce be passed without prejudice. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries was called.

AMERICAN REGISTER-BARK CERES.

Mr. SIMPKINS. Mr. Speaker, by instruction of the committee I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 8190) to provide an American register for the bark Ceres.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Navigation is hereby authorized and directed to cause the bark Ceres, built in Maine, recently owned by foreigners, but now owned by citizens of the United States, to be registered as a vessel of the United States, under the name of Lichtenfels Brothers.

Mr. SIMPKINS. I ask for the reading of the report, The report (by Mr. SIMPKINS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, having carefully considered the bill (H. R. 8190) to provide an American register for the bark Ceres, beg leave to report, recommending that the bill do pass.

The Ceres is an American-built vessel, having been built in Maine in 1859. She was for some years sailed as an American vessel, and subsequently sold to foreign owners. She is now owned by American oitizens, who desire to convert her into a barge for the coastwise trade, at an expense of about $3,000. The laws which barred American-built vessels from an American register after once being sold to foreigners were enacted in 1797 and 1804. The reasons for such a law no longer exist.

Mr. SIMPKINS. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SIMPKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

AMERICAN REGISTER-BARGE BLACK DIAMOND.

Mr. SIMPKINS. I call up now the bill (H. R. 7781) to provide an American register for the barge Black Diamond.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Navigation is hereby authorized and directed to cause the foreign-built barge Thomas S. Falck, owned by the Mobile Coal Company, of Mobile, Ala., a corporation under the laws of Alabama, to be registered as a vessel of the United States under the name of Black Diamond.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SIMPKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

AMERICAN REGISTER-STEAMER KAHULUI.

Mr. SIMPKINS. I also call up the bill (H. R. 1706) to provide an American register for the steamer Kahului.

The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Navigation is hereby authorized and directed to cause the foreign-built steamer Kahului, purchased and owned by Charles Nelson, a citizen of the United States, and repaired in the United States, to be registered as a vessel of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to cause the inspection of said vessel, steam boilers, steam pipes, and their appurtenances, and to cause to be granted the usual certificate issued to steam vessels of the merchant marine, without reference to the fact that said steam boilers, steam pipes, and appurtenances were not constructed pursuant to the laws of the United States, and were not constructed of iron stamped pursuant to said laws; and the tests in the inspection of said boilers, steam pipes, and appurtenances shall be the same in all respects as to strength and safety as are required in an inspection of boilers constructed in the United States for marine purposes.

Mr. Speaker, Lwish to move an expendence.

Mr. SIMPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to move an amendment by substituting Senate bill No. 206 for the House bill. This bill has passed the Senate, and is identical with the bill just read by the Clerk; and I ask that the House bill lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The Senate bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SIMPKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The bill H. R. 1706 was laid on the table.

MARKING OF VESSELS' NAMES.

Mr. SIMPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I call up for present consideration the bill (S. 1424) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend section 4178, Revised Statutes, in relation to the marking of vessels' names at bow and stern, and also to provide for marking the draft," approved February 21, 1891.

The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to amend section 4178, Revised Statutes, in relation to the marking of vessels' names at bow and stern, and also to provide for marking the draft," approved February 21, 1891, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"That section 4178 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, amended to read entire as follows:

"SEC. 4178. The name of every documented vessel of the United States shall be marked upon each bow and upon the stern, and the home port shall also be marked upon the stern. These names shall be painted or gilded, or consist of cut or caved or cast roman letters in light color on a dark ground, or in a dark color on a light ground, secured in place, and to be distinctly visible. The smallest letters used shall not be less in size than 4 inches. If any such vessel shall be found without these names being so marked, the owner or owners shall be liable to a penalty of $10 for each name omitted: Provided, however, That the names on each bow may be marked within the year 1896."

"SEC. 2. That the draft of every registered vessel shall be marked upon the stem and stern post, in English feet or decimeters, in either arabic or roman numerals. The bottom of each numeral shall indicate the draft to that line."

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call the attention of the gen-

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to the fact that the proposition in the bill is that the names shall be marked, as indicated, "within the year 1896.

Mr. SIMPKINS. I move to insert "1897" for "1896."
The amendment was adopted.
The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, it was passed.

On motion of Mr. SIMPKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SIMPKINS. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries being absent, I move that the committee be passed over without prejudice for the present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the call of the committee may be temporarily suspended without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Committee on the Territories was called.

RIGHTS OF ALIENS TO REAL ESTATE IN THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. CATRON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 9709) to better define and regulate the rights of aliens to hold and own real estate in the Territories.

Mr. CATRON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 9709) to better define and regulate the rights of aliens to hold and own real estate in the Territories follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act to restrict the ownership of real estate in the Territories to American citizons, etc.," approved March 35 at the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"That no alien or person who is not a citizen of the United States, or who has not declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States in the Territories of the United States except as herelandter provided. Provided, That the prohibition of this section shall not apply to cases in which the right to hold or dispose of lands in the United States is secured by existing treaties to hold or dispose of lands in the United States is secured by existing treaties controlled to the control of the United States is secured by existing treaties are in force, and no longer.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Speaker, I would ask if that is not the same bill that was defeated in an attempt to pass it a few weeks ago? A bill referring to alien ownership of land in the Territories was considered and defeated in the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make that point of order? Mr. BLUE. I do, sir. I think that bill has been defeated once this session

Mr. CATRON. This is not the same bill, I will state to the gentleman. While it contains many provisions of that bill, it contains others that were not embodied in it.

Mr. BLUE. Is this a House or a Senate bill?
Mr. CATRON. A House bill.
The SPEAKER. Was the bill ordered to be brought up by the committee?

Mr. CATRON. Yes, sir; and it was reported by the committee. The SPEAKER. And this is brought up under the order of the committee?

Mr. CATRON. The committee directed me to report the bill and bring it up at the earliest moment. They did not order me to bring it up now, but to report the bill and call it up as soon as I could. The committee has been called, and this bill is in order under the call, and under the direction given to me I call it up for consideration.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Speaker, I understand that some modifications have been made in this bill, and I am told that it is satisfactory now to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Hepburn] who the other day opposed it in its then condition. I am informed that it has been changed so as to meet with his approval. If that is true, I do not care to press this point of order, but I should like to be cartain that my information is correct.

certain that my information is correct.

Mr. CATRON. I will state that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Hepburn] who made the objection told me he would make no objection to the bill. I spoke to him about it.

Mr. McEWAN. Mr. Speaker, I renew the point of order. I think that some time ought to be given to us, when we are asked to change the organical or of the local asked to the process of the local asked to the local think that some time ought to be given to us, when we are asked to change the organic law of the land, a law that has been in existence in this country and in England for many years, and which is a proper principle. I raise the point of order, and ask that the bill go over sufficiently long to enable us—

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman state his point of order?
Mr. McEWAN. It is that this bill, substantially, has been before the House at this session, and has been defeated.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman give the Chair some authority for his point of order?

Mr. McEWAN. I submit it to the Speaker.
The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see that the point of order would be good. If the bill is changed, it ceases to be the same bill.
Mr. McEWAN. I say it is substantially the same bill that was defeated.

defeated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that point of order could be sustained.

Mr. McEWAN. Then, if you will pardon me for saying so, I submit it to the superior knowledge of the Speaker on parliamentary matters, recalling that less than two weeks ago the Chair voluntarily tried to take me off my feet three times inside of two minutes, without being asked by anybody in the House, and I thought perhaps the Speaker in this instance would have used the same knowledge that he had at that time.

The SPEAKER. Well, the Chair does use it, and overrules the point of order.

Mr. McEWAN. Very well.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. CANNON. Wherein does this bill change the existing law?

Mr. DOCKERY. It seems to me there ought to be some explanation of it.

nation of it.

The SPEAKER, The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question being taken, Mr. McEwan demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes 4.

Mr. McEWAN. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McEwan] makes the point of no quorum.

And then, on motion of Mr. Loud (at 4 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive com-munications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Ahnapee Harbor, Wisconsin—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmit-ting a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, submit-ting an increase in the estimate of appropriation for the continu-ation of the investigation and exploration of the coal and gold resources of Alaska-to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, recommending an appropriation for the construction of a money vault in the subtreasury portion of the Boston post-office-to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the House resolution of June 5, 1896, lists of appointments and changes of employees in the Interior Department—to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 12, 1897.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. Milburn, D. D.
The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. Nelson, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

CERTIFICATION OF ELECTORS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate four communications from the Secretary of State, transmitting, in pursuance of the provisions of the act of February 3, 1887, certified copies of the final ascertainment of the electors for President and Vice-President for the States of New York, New Hampshire, Nevada, and Utah; which were ordered to lie on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. NELSON. I present resolutions of the Atlantic Coast Seamen's Union, and ask that they may be read and spread upon the RECORD. I make the request because the secretary and the president of the association have asked me to prefer such a request. The resolutions are short. I should like to have them read and spread upon the record.

spread upon the record.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HILL. What is the nature of the request?
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York makes an inquiry of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HILL. I wish to learn what is the

Mr. HILL. I wish to learn what is the precise request.
Mr. NELSON. It is to have the resolution read and printed in the RECORD. The petition comes to me from a sailors' association with that request.

with that request.

Mr. HILL. It strikes me that we must have some rule upon the subject. A year or two ago my distinguished friend from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], who is now absent from his seat, uniformly objected to having all petitions and resolutions of this character printed in the RECORD. Of late everything of the kind pretty much has been printed in the RECORD. While I sympathize with the resolutions, I think, and the object the petitioners have in view, I do not believe we ought to lumber up the RECORD with such matters. I objected yesterday to a matter presented by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], and it strikes me that I shall be compelled to object to this request, suggesting to the Senator from Minnesota that it will answer every purpose if the petition is printed as a document.

Mr. NELSON. I ask to have it read to the Senate this morning. I presume I would have the right to read it in my own time, but in place of doing so I ask to have the Secretary read it.

Mr. HILL. There are ways, of course, to evade the rule. I realize that fact. The Senator, of course, can take any course he sees fit.

Mr. NELSON. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection. The resolutions are very short.

Mr. HILL. I will withdraw it by reason of the appeal, but hereafter I shall object to printing such matters in the Congression.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolu-tions presented by the Senator from Minnesota. Mr. HALE. I submit, if the Senator from New York has withdrawn his objection, that there is no need for the reading of the petition. Let it be printed in the RECORD, as requested by the Senator from Minnesota.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is that course satisfactory to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. NELSON. It is satisfactory.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

ATLANTIC COAST SEAMEN'S UNION.

[General office: 152 Commercial street, Boston, Mass.]

Port of New York, January 4, 1897.

Whereas American seamen under the present laws enjoy that measure of personal liberty accorded to all men by the Constitution of the United States, being subject to imprisonment and forfeiture of their wages and clothing for violation of a civil contract to perform labor (Revised Statutes, sections 4506, 4598, 4599, and 4601); and

Whereas by section 10 of the act of Congress of 1884, as amended in 1886, seamen are permitted, and by the combinations of the crimps compelled, to sign away to an "original creditor," whether they owe it to him or not, more than 50 per cent of their wages before having earned the same, thus keeping them in a perpetual state of debt and poverty amounting virtually to slavery; and

Whereas seamen are subject on the high seas to corporal punishment for any triffing offense which may by the master be construed as "justifiable cause to beat, wound, or imprison" them (Revised Statutes, section 5347); and

whereas those provisions allotted to American seamen by law are decidedly less in quantity, and generally inferior in quality, to the rations served out to convicts in our penitentiaries, thereby causing American ships, in proportion to their tonnage, to furnish five times as many cases of scurvy and beri-beri as those of Great Britain, the leading maritime nation of the world: Therefore as those of Great Britain, the leading martine metors of the work, in mass meeting fore, Resolved, That we, the seamen of the port of New York, in mass meeting assembled, hereby earnestly urge upon the Senate Committee on Commerce to report favorably on bills H. R. 2003 and 6309, as passed by the House of Representatives on the 8th of June, 1896, and we appeal to all United States Senators to interest themselves in the speedy enactment into law of the aforesaid bills before the adjournment of the Fitty-fourth Congress.

The above resolution was carried by acclamation, after which the meeting adjourned at 12.30 p. m.

F. H. BURYESON, Secretary.

F. H. BURYESON, Secretary. TIMOTHY CARROLL, Chairman.

Mr. CALL. I present a petition of sundry citizens of Florida living in Brevard County, who are interested and concerned in the improvement of the waterway between Titusville and Canaveral Landing, on the Banana River. The petitioners show that if a small appropriation were made it would make a vast and desirable improvement on this waterway and open the whole of that region of country to cheaper navigation. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ask the committee to give it early and favorable consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is a matter of some importance, and I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business for a few moments.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RED RIVER BRIDGE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1726) to approve and ratify the construction of a bridge across the Red River, between the States of Arkansas and Texas, at a point above the town of Fulton, in Arkansas, on said river, built by the Texarkana Northern Railway Company, but now owned and operated by the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company, and to authorize the latter company to maintain said bridge over said waterway, subject to certain stipulations and conditions.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was, after section 6, to insert an additional section; and it was read, as follows:

SEC. 7. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date of approval thereof.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

Mr. FRYE. It is the House amendment which has just been read?

Mr. BLANCHARD. It is. The Senate bill was passed by the House with an amendment suggested by the House committee and adopted by the House. It just adds another section to the bill to the effect that the bridge must be commenced within a certain time and finished within a certain time. That is all there is in it.

Mr. FRYE. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. Browning, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed Browning, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 206) to provide an American register for the steamer Kahului; and

A bill (S. 1646) providing for certain requirements for vessels propelled by gas, fluid, naphtha, or electric motors.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1424) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend section 4178, Revised Statutes, in relation to the marking of vessels' names at bow and stern, and also to provide for marking the draft," approved February 21, 1891, with an amendment in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

A bill (H. R. 878) to reduce the cases in which the penalty of death may be inflicted;

A bill (H. R. 1261) for the relief of John Kehl and to restore him

A bill (H. R. 1261) for the relief of John Kehl and to restore him to his former rating;

A bill (H. R. 2259) for the relief of William B. Ellis;
A bill (H. R. 2328) for the relief of Patrick Rainey;

SENATOR FROM DELAWARE.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I rise to a question of privi-lege having reference to the vacant seat in this body belonging to the State of Delaware, and I will read the following memorial:

To the honorable the Senate of the United States:

To the honorable the Senate of the United States:

Your petitioner, Henry A. Du Pont, who is now a citizen of the State of Delaware, and has been such continuously during his whole life, begs leave to state and show that on the 9th day of May, 1895, he was duly and legally elected to the Senate of the United States by the legislature of the State of Delaware for the term of six years beginning on the 4th day of March, 1895, and in due time his credentials as such Senator-elect were presented and filed; but objection being made as to the legality of such election, the said credentials were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections with directions to investigate such election and report to the Senate; and this was done by such committee and a report submitted favorable to the validity of such election, with a resolution for adoption by the Senate that your petitioner was entitled to his seat under and by virtue of such election.

After debate upon the matter, the committee's resolution was not adopted, and your petitioner was denied a seat.

Your petitioner respectfully claims that his said election was legal and that he is entitled thereunder to a seat as a Senator from the State of Delaware, and further respectfully claims that injustice has been done the State of Delaware and your petitioner by the refusal of your honorable body to seat him as a Senator from the said State.

Your petitioner therefore submits that, under the circumstances, the question of the validity of his election should again be investigated and acted upon by the Senate as a fixed, continuing body which never loses and never can lose control and jurisdiction over its membership, and which can not forfeit or surrender its right at any time to inquire into the claim of any person as a member thereof.

Your petitioner further states that he hopes and expects to show on another or surrender its right at any time to inquire into the claim of any person as a member thereof.

Your petitioner further states that he hopes and expects to show on another consideration of the subject that he is entitled legally to such seat.

Wherefore he respectfully prays that all the papers and documents on file in such case be taken therefrom and again referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, with directions to such committee to reinvestigate such election and to reconsider the same in full and in all particulars, and report to the Senate, that it may reconsider the case and seat your petitioner, as he deems law and justice to the State of Delaware and to himself require to be done, and for such other relief as he may be entitled to.

Very respectfully,

H. A. DU PONT.

H. A. DU PONT.

The undersigned, who were members of the Delaware legislature on the 9th day of May, 1995, and who voted on that date for Henry A. Du Pont for the office of United States Senator from Delaware, most heartily join in the foregoing petition, and respectfully request that it be granted.

WILLIAM WILSON, JR.
FREDERIC PYLE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington?

Mr. PLATT. I desire to introduce a resolution before we proceed to business on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is interposed. The introduction of bills and joint resolutions is still in order.

TERMS OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. HILL. I introduce a bill which I ask may be read, when I shall ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to make a brief explanation of the bill, and I will then ask that it be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. The bill (S. 3514) to regulate the term of office of postmasters, was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the term of office of all postmasters hereafter appointed shall be four years, subject to the power of removal or suspension according to law. That in case of a vacancy occurring in the office of a postmaster, occasioned by death, removal, resignation, or otherwise, the same shall be filled by appointment for the remaining unexpired term.

That the term of office of a postmaster shall be deemed to commence from the date of his assumption of the discharge of the duties of his office, a record of which shall be kept in the office of the Postmaster-General.

That the term of office of all postmasters now in office shall be four years (subject to the power of removal or suspension according to law), and such terms shall be deemed to have commenced from the date of the assumption of the duties of the office by the occupant: Provided, however, That where the present occupant shall have been appointed to fill a vacancy occasioned by the death, removal, resignation, or otherwise, of his immediate predecessor, he shall only hold his office for the remainder of the unexpired term of four years, provided he was appointed from the same political party to which such predecessor belonged, or is a member of the family of such predecessor.

Sec. 2. All acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed. Sec. 3. This act shall take effect immediately.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, the object of this bill is to remedy

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, the object of this bill is to remedy the present situation of post-office appointments. The matter is now in a sort of a hotch-potch condition, and I think it important at this particular time to commence political bookkeeping upon correct principles and fair and honorable policies.

The object of the bill is to determine definitely and certainly exactly what ought to be done in regard to post-office appointments. I call the attention of the Senate, in the first place, to the material alteration proposed in the existing law. The bill provides that all postmasters shall hold their terms for the definite period of four years. Fourth-class postmasters have always held their terms of office at the pleasure of the appointing power. This is a "reform," if I may use that expression, whereby a defi-nite term shall be fixed for those offices.

nite term shall be fixed for those offices.

Permit me to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that both political parties have used this power for the arbitrary and summary removal of fourth-class postmasters. It has been deemed that as they hold their offices at the pleasure of the appointing power the appointing power should remove them at will without any reason being given whatever. The policy was pursued, perhaps, to the satisfaction of all parties at that period, when the office of Assistant Postmaster-General was held by the distinguished Presiding Officer of this body. Subsequently, under the administration of a "reform" Postmaster-General, Mr. Wanamaker, of Pennsylvania—and I trust I do not offend the distinguished junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] by thus speaking of that Postmaster-General—that same policy was pursued, and he removed fourth-class postmasters at will. sued, and he removed fourth-class postmasters at will.

Since the advent of the present Administration to power, a new policy has been pursued with regard to fourth-class post-offices; whether wisely or unwisely, whether to the demoralization of the party to which the President belongs or otherwise, I do not now propose to discuss. The present Administration has permitted fourth-class postmasters to serve out a full four years' term, although there is no term fixed by law. Removals have been very rare, and made for good and sufficient cause.

Mr. President, I know not what the new Administration of Mr. McKinley may do. I do not know of anyone around this circle who is authorized to speak for him; but it may be that we must trust to the generosity of the incoming President to pursue the policy of the present Administration. I think the matter had better be regulated by law. I think if the policy pursued by the present Administration is to be continued at all, it should be settled, determined, and continued by law, and that the appointing power should be relieved of the importunities which will be made upon it to immediately remove these Democratic postmasters and appoint Republican partisans in their places. Therefore this bill is presented. In the end it will be the fairest for both parties. appoint Republican partisans in their places. Therefore this oill is presented. In the end it will be the fairest for both parties. All post-offices of whatever grade should be placed upon a par. Therefore, the first point in favor of this bill is that it makes the term of fourth-class postmasters a definite and fixed term of four years, subject to the right of removal for good and sufficient cause. I think it will be productive of much good if Congress shall now pass this bill and establish the principle that these offices which, whether wisely or unwisely, foolishly or necessarily, have been made the football of party politics shall be placed upon some basis which is definite. Let it not be said that one Administration by reason of its wisdom or its caprice, or whatever you may please to term it, allowed all these officers to remain for four years, and another Administration arbitrarily and unwarrantedly turned them out of office.

What next does the bill provide? It provides a method by which political bookkeeping can be made accurate. The difficulty now is that a nomination may be made, and it may be held up by the Senate for a long period of time. It may be a recess appointment. The person takes possession of the office. I know of several cases where nominations have been held up for a year or so, the President persisting in making the appointment and the Senate not choosing to confirm. Subsequently the Senate relents and the postmaster is confirmed. It is held that under existing law he holds his office from the date of his confirmation. That gives the That gives the office. When a officer in all such cases a five or six years' term of office. new Administration comes into power, it must trump up charges to satisfy the conscience of the President—and sometimes it does not take very much to satisfy the consciences of our Presidents where they desire to make removals—in order to make an immewhere they desire to make removals—in order to make an inime-diate change. I would relieve every Administration from the responsibility for this state of affairs. I would relieve all Admin-istrations from the importunities of their party friends in asking that in such cases a removal shall be made.

Mr. President, there is another class of cases. A postmaster holds for three years and over—a Democratic postmaster, for instance. Few die and none resign. Once in a while a Democratic stance. Few die and none resign. Once in a while a Democratic postmaster dies, and the President sees fit to send in the name of his widow for that office. The Democrat may have held the office for a period of three years and a half, and our Republican friends naturally object, under the existing political situation, to having the widow confirmed for four years.

Without endeavoring or intending now to divulge any of the secrets of the Post-Office Committee, I speak upon this subject with full knowledge of the situation, being one of the minority members of that committee. I have been importuned by Democratic all parts of the Union to look after their rights. There is a large number of States where there are no Democratic representatives number of States where there are no Democratic representatives in this Chamber, and Democratic Senators are becoming gradually less, especially in the Northern States. There are postmasters writing to me from all parts of the North calling attention to the fact of their nomination and asking what can be done. There are to-day 250 Democratic nominations in the hands of the Post-Office to-day 250 Democratic nominations in the hands of the Post-Office Committee awaiting some action. There are postmasterships now about which there will be some friction, which will continue to become greater until the 4th day of March.

Mr. CHANDLER. Is it convenient for the Senator to have me ask him a question at this time?

Mr. HILL. I hope the Senator will wait until I get through. Then I shall be pleased to answer.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is right in this connection.

Mr. HILL. Very well.

Mr. CHANDLER.
Mr. HILL. Very well.
Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator stated that the present Administration had not made removals of postmasters during the terms in their commissions. I want to ask the Senator whether he is able to say removals have not been made since the whether he is able to say removals have not been made since the 3d day of November last of postmasters on account of their political action in the election of that day?

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, what I was particularly saying was that fourth-class postmasters had been allowed to serve out a full term of four years, although there was no law fixing the term. That, as a general rule, is absolutely true. It is further absolutely true that every postmaster whose appointment is fixed by law has been allowed to serve out his term with possibly a half dozen exceptions, where they have been removed for alleged political or pernicious activity. Allow me to say right here, Mr. President, that I take but little stock in those removals. But that is now foreign to the real question involved.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me to say he has not answered my question. The question is whether since the 3d of November last Presidential appointments, officers confirmed by the Senate, have not been removed during the term for which they were appointed on account of their political conduct at that elec-

Mr. HILL. Yes; I think that is so as to a few of them, a half dozen of them.

Mr. CHANDLER. Is the Senator informed as to the number?

Mr. HILL. I think about half a dozen.
Mr. CHANDLER. Judging from the complaints that have come to me, there are a great many more than that.

Mr. HILL. By the clamor one would think there were a thou-

Mr. CHANDLER. I should think there were many more than half a dozen. The complaint is specifically made to me as a member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads that postmasters have been removed for no other reason than because they voted for Mr. Bryan for President; and I want to present that fact, if it is so, in opposition to the statement of the Senator from New York that while Mr. Wanamaker made removals of postmasters during his term this Administration has not removed any postmasters during the terms for which they were appointed.

masters during the terms for which they were appointed.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, the defense of the former Postmaster-General, Mr. Wanamaker, is entirely superfluous and uncalled for. The Senator will recollect what I said. I said Mr. Wanamaker had pursued the policy pursued by his predecessors in office of removing at pleasure all fourth-class postmasters. That is the proposition I made. I did not speak of Mr. Wanamaker's action in regard to Presidential offices. I know he made some removals in such cases. Let me give the Senator an instance.

stance.

Mr. PLATT rose

Mr. HILL. I decline to from Connecticut to wait. I decline to be interrupted now. I ask the Senator

In the city of Elmira a Republican postmaster was appointed In the city of Elmira a Republican postmaster was appointed by Mr. Harrison very early in his Administration in the place of a Democrat, whose term of office had expired. He was confirmed and held office for three years and a half. Then, by reason of a factional squabble in the Republican party, an inspector was sent to Elmira, and he trumped up some charges against as good a postmaster as there ever was in that city. That Republican postmaster was removed under the "reform" administration of Mr. Wanamaker, and another Republican was put in his place. If the present Administration had not taken action about it, we should have had the spectacle presented of seven years and a half should have had the spectacle presented of seven years and a half of a Republican postmaster and a half year of a Democratio postmaster.

Let me go further, and be entirely frank, because there is no politics involved in this question—I mean no political advantage to be gained by either party by this bill, but there is fair politics involved in an honorable disposition of this question. Mr. Cleveinvolved in an honorable disposition of this question. Mr. Cleveland kept that Republican postmaster in office until about a year or so ago, and then the Post-Office Department here, in the usual way, sent an inspector up there, who trumped up some charges against the postmaster, and the present Administration put him out, and a good Democrat occupies the office to-day. But it is against just that miserable way of doing business that I protest. It is just such a method that I desire to have avoided in the future. Let these men hold their offices for four years.

What was the remedy? After the Republican had held this office for three years and a half, and by reason of a factional squabble it was desired to remove him another Republican should have ble it was desired to remove him, another Republican should have been appointed for only the remaining six months. That is what this bill provides. Not that every commission shall be for four years—that is the existing law—but that every appointment shall be for four years, and where a vacancy occurs by removal, by resignation, or by death that the new appointee shall hold for the remainder of the unexpired term, provided he is of the same political faith.

I have also provided in the bill for a case where the appointee belongs to the same family, thus covering the case of the widows and daughters of a deceased postmaster. That is a fair proposition. This question has got to be settled. It will be as fair for one party as for another in the end.

When the new Administration comes in, what spectacle will confront it? Within the last ten days there have been several appointments sent to the Senate of widows of deceased postmasters. Of course, our Republican friends will dislike to object to their confirmation. Republican members of the other House will naturally not desire them to be confirmed. Why? Because the new appointees will hold over three years and a half of a new Administration, and no political party should get an advantage over another party by death, removal, or resignation. That is the point involved, and that is the effect of this bill. It is a simple measure, Our Democratic friends will want this measure in 1901. Both parties ought to have it now. It prevents a scramble from now until the 4th of March in regard to the appointment or confirmation of these various postmasters.

Mr. President, I have already said that there are 250 nominations now pending before the Post-Office Committee. What is to be done with them? Am I to appeal simply to the generosity of my opponents for action upon those nominations? Are we to have my opponents for action upon those nominations? Are we to have a squabble which will become more and more severe every three months during the closing days of every Administration? I think we should not. I think the best policy would be to define exactly the status of these postmasters, and let them thoroughly understand what is to be done.

That is the effect of this bill. It gives no political party any advantage over another. In other words, there is no injustice to us and no injustice to our Republican friends. Possibly my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] will say that I need not worry about the Republicans, that they are competent need not worry about the Republicans, that they are competent to take care of themselves. They are usually, and they generally get the advantage of the Democratic people. We Democrats do not wish to be taken for chumps, if I may use such an expression. Let us have the rights of our respective parties defined by law, and let not the terms of office depend upon the importunity of members of Congress, upon the good nature of Senators, upon their ability to persuade and induce their colleagues to confirm certain nominations.

A fourth-class postmaster holds, as I said before, during the pleasure of the appointing power. There has been a large number of fourth-class postmasterships raised to the third class durfor or fourth-class postmasterships raised to the third class during the present Administration, and they have been raised to the third class after the Democratic appointee had held the office for over three years, and if we confirm the Democratic appointee many of these particular Democratic appointees will hold for seven-odd years. That is unjust to the Republican party, and undoubtedly there will be more or less contention before the 3d day of March on the question of nominations. I want to avoid that.

Mr. President, when you have made a third-class office out of a fourth-class office and appoint the man who has held the place for three years, that Democrat should be satisfied when his four years are out, and he should turn the office over to a Republican. That are out, and he should turn the office over to a Republican. That can not be done under the existing law. The only way a new Administration can make all things even for the party is to go to the miserable subterfuge of trumping up charges to satisfy the conscience of the President in order to put the incumbent out. What has been done under the present Administration has been done under all Administrations, except that the present Administration has allowed all fourth-class postmasters to fill out a full period of four years just as though the law provided for a fouryear term.

Mr. ALLEN. May I ask a question of the honorable Senator from New York?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask the Senator from New York if he can recall any instance in the history of the country where the President of the United States has removed any postmaster or other officer for loyally and intelligently supporting the nominee of his party for loyally and intelligently supporting the nominee of his party for President?

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I am not going to stir up old bygones; but away back in the time when Mr. Douglas was the candidate for President of the regular Democratic party, and Mr. Breckinridge was the candidate of another wing of that party, postmasters were removed by President Buchanan for the simple offense of supporting Mr. Douglas for the Presidency; and the records are full of just such instances.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HILL. I am not to be diverted into a discussion of this last subject, because that question is not involved. This bill will not prevent any President from removing a man from office upon charges. You can not so provide. You have got, should this bill become a law, still to trust the appointing power, because he must have the inherent right to remove for cause; but I want to relieve every Administration from the necessity of trumping up charges in order to equalize political advantages. That is what this bill

If any President shall see fit to remove an official because of "pernicious activity," as it is called—a phrase which I do not fully comprehend, understand, or appreciate—there is no way of preventing it, because he has the absolute power to remove under the Constitution of the United States and under our existing laws. Take the case of a Democrat whose post-office has just been made a third-class office. He has held office for three years and a half, and now under his commission he is going to hold for four years more. The Republican member of Congress from that district wants to oust that man. Naturally he does not want him, because his political friends at home will say: "This is not right. Simply because that office was made a third-class post-office is no reason why this man should be permitted to remain in his office." is the effect of it? His party friends get around the Postmaster-General and trump up this charge and that charge against him in order to secure his removal, whereas if the term of the office should expire after a man had held for the full term of four years, he could honorably retire from the office. It is to prevent these removals, which more or less carry a stigma with them, that I have introduced this bill and because my extention has been called to introduced this bill, and because my attention has been called to them on account of the fact that I am an humble member of the minority of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, where, to a large extent, the burden of looking after the interests of the minority falls.

Therefore, Mr. President, I submit my proposition, which I hope will be taken up by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads in the spirit in which I have introduced it, and that they may be induced, in the interest of better government and in the interest of fair political dealing, to report favorably on this bill. What else I desire to say on this subject may better be said in executive

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for a reprint of Senate bill 8488, which has been incorrectly printed, partly through my fault and partly through the fault of the Printing Office.

through the fault of the Frinting Office.

The order was agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That the bill (S. 3488) to create a board of trustees of the Union Pacific Railroad Company and the Central Pacific Railroad Company, and to fund the bond debts thereof, and for other purposes, be reprinted. ABBREVIATION OF CONGRESSIONAL REPORTS.

Mr. PLATT submitted the following resolution; which was

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules is instructed to consider the practicability of abbreviating the daily reports of the proceedings of Congress as published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. HOAR. Who will abbreviate the reports?

Mr. PLATT. I do not wish to make any remarks about the resolution, except to say that there is a growing necessity for lessening the volume of the Congressional Record. I desire that the resolution may be referred to the Committee on Rules. I have introduced it simply to call the attention of the Committee on Rules to the subject.

Mr. GORMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Connecticut that that resolution ought to go to the Committee on Printing, as that committee has special charge of the matter of the printing of the RECORD.

Mr. PLATT. I have no objection to that reference.
Mr. HALE. I think the Committee on Printing would be very glad to have the valuable suggestions of the Committee on Rules before acting upon the resolution, and I should prefer that the resolution in its travels should go first to the Committee on Rules, and then, after a proper delay, it will come to the Committee on Printing for proper delay there. [Laughter.]

Mr. PLATT. It is a resolution instructing the Committee on Rules to consider the question. I ask, therefore, that it may be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HALE. I think that is better.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Rules.

tion will be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CULLOM submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved. That the stenographer reporting the hearings before the Committee on Interstate Commerce under the resolution of the Senate of December 9, 1896, and also the hearings pending before the Committee on the Census, be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. Very well. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from Ne-braska [Mr. Allen], which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed and required to inform the Senate—

First, whether Isaac Walker & Sons, of Philadelphia, Pa., who are engaged in constructing additions to and making repairs on the naval hospital at Brooklyn, in the State of New York, have violated, or are violating, or suffering violations of the act of Congress of August 1, 1892, commonly known as the "eight-hour labor law," by requiring those engaged in laboring for them on said work to work more than eight hours per day; and if so, what steps, if any, have been taken by the Navy Department to prevent such violations; and if like violations are being committed by P. J. Carlan, a contractor, of Brooklyn, N. Y., and what steps, if any, are being taken to prevent the same; and Second, what measures, if any, have been taken by the Navy Department to prevent violations of the so-called eight-hour labor law on Government works under its supervision; and if no such measures have been taken, what further legislation, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Navy, is necessary to empower the Navy Department to supervise, control, and restrain the action of contractors and builders engaged in the construction and repairs of Government property.

Government property.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to say that when this resolution was under consideration yesterday, the Senator from Nebraska was right and I was wrong. There is a law upon the statute book which prohibits the employment for more than eight hours a day of laborers and workmen by any contractor on the public works of the United States, and therefore a resolution which suggests violations of that law is a proper resolution to be adopted. I send the act to the desk and ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as represted if there he no objection.

quested, if there be no objection. The Secretary read as follows:

CHAPTER 352, LAWS OF THE FIFTY-SECOND CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION. An act relating to the limitation of the hours of daily service of laborers and mechanics employed upon the public works of the United States and of the District of Columbia.

mechanics employed upon the public works of the United States and of the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That the service and employment of all laborers and mechanics who are now or may hereafter be employed by the Government of the United States, by the District of Columbia, or by any contractor or subcontractor upon any of the public works of the United States or of the said District of Columbia, is hereby limited and restricted to eight hours in any one calendar day, and it shall be unlawful for any officer of the United States Government or of the District of Columbia or any such contractor or subcontractor whose duty it shall be to employ, direct, or control the services of such laborers or mechanics to require or permit any such laborer or mechanic to work more than eight hours in any calendar day except in case of extraordinary emergency.

Sec. 2. That any officer or agent of the Government of the United States or of the District of Columbia, or any contractor or subcontractor whose duty it shall be to employ, direct, or control any laborer or mechanic employed upon any of the public works of the United States or of the District of Columbia, who shall intentionally violate any provision of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and for each and every such offense shall upon conviction be punished by a fine not to exceed $1,000 or by imprisonment for not more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court having jurisdiction thereof.

Sec. 3. The provisions of this act shall not be so construed as to in any manner apply to or affect contractors or subcontractors or to limit the hours of daily service of laborers or mechanics engaged upon the public works of the United States or of the District of Columbia for which contracts have been entered into prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the date of the act be read.

The SECRETARY. An act approved August 1, 1892.

Mr. Allen obtained the floor.

Mr. HALE. Before the Senator from Nebraska proceeds, let me ask him a question. At what place is the allegation that the law was violated fixed by the Senator? I did not notice that point in the reading of the resolution.

Mr. ALLEN. At what locality?
Mr. HALE. Yes.
Mr. ALLEN. Brooklyn, N. Y.
Mr. HALE. In the navy-yard?
Mr. ALLEN. Yes, in the hospital.
Mr. HALE. I call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska. to what I understand is a fact, that the law which has just been read has been construed as applicable to men employed under contract upon public works, that is, upon buildings, and that it has been construed as not applicable to outside work upon materials been construed as not applicable to outside work upon materials before they enter into or are entering into the construction of the building. Whether that is true about navy-yards I do not know. Mr. ALLEN. I do not think there can be any doubt about its application in this case.

Mr. CHANDLER. The first clause specified in the resolution is work upon the naval hospital in Brooklyn.

Mr. ALLEN. It refers to men engaged in work upon constructing an addition to and making repairs of the naval hospital itself.

itself.

Mr. HALE. Upon the building?
Mr. ALLEN. Yes, and not engaged in planing lumber or sawing lumber preparatory to its going into the building.
Mr. HALE. I think the law has been construed as applying

Mr. HALE. I think the law has been construed as applying clearly to such a case.

Mr. ALLEN. I quite agree with the Senator on that point.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is not stated what P. J. Carlin, the contractor at Brooklyn, is doing, and I should like to call attention to the distinction drawn by the Senator from Maine that the law does not apply to contracts for ships. It applies to nothing except repairs upon real estate, public works of the Government, such as buildings and river and harbor improvements.

Mr. ALLEN. This is purely a resolution calling for information, and I desire to submit simply a word in its support and not to argue it at length.

to argue it at length.

Under the first section of the act of August 1, 1892, volume 27, page 340, of the United States Statutes at Large, it occurs to me that no man can mistake the fact that Congress by that act prohibited the employment of men in its service or men engaged in contract work for more than eight hours per day. Now, I will read that section, although it has been read by the Secretary:

That the service and employment of all laborers and mechanics who are now or may hereafter be employed by the Government of the United States, by the District of Columbia, or by any contractor or subcontractor upon any of the public works of the United States or of the said District of Columbia, is hereby limited and restricted to eight hours in any one calendar day, and it shall be unlawful for any officer of the United States Government, or of the District of Columbia, or any such contractor or subcontractor whose duty it shall be to employ, direct, or control the services of such laborers or mechanics to require or permit any such laborer or mechanic to work more than eight hours in any calendar day except in case of extraordinary emergency.

So that section, prohibits the Government and the District of hours in any calendar day except in case of extraordinary emergency.

So that section prohibits the Government and the District of Columbia and contractors and subcontractors with the Government from working their men more than eight hours a day.

Now, the singular fact about this matter is that the attention of the Secretary of the Navy was called in a respectful manner by Mr. Charles Burns, secretary of the Board of Delegates of the Building Trades of Brooklyn and vicinity, 123 Smith street, Brooklyn, N. Y., to this violation of the law by Walker & Sons, and to the letter of Mr. Burns the Secretary of the Navy on the 8th of December, 1896, replied as follows: December, 1896, replied as follows:

December, 1896, replied as follows:

Sir: This Department is in receipt of your letter of the 7th instant, in which you state that you are instructed by the Building Trades of the city of Brooklyn to invite attention to an alleged violation of the eight-hour law on the part of the contractor for the naval hospital, and ask that this Department see that the law be not violated by the contractor in connection with the work upon said building.

In reply you are advised that it has been and is the policy of this Department to insist upon an absolute observance, both in letter and spirit, of the requirements of the act of August 1, 182, commonly called the eight-hour law, so far as all laborers or mechanics employed under its direction or control are concerned, and I am not aware of any instance in which the provisions in the law are being violated by any of the subordinate officers or employees of this Department. By reference to the law itself, however—

Have in the remarkable next of the latter of the Secretary of the

Here is the remarkable part of the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, in view of the language of the law which I have read-you will perceive at once that the Navy Department is not charged with the duty, and is not given the power, to enforce the law with respect to laborers and mechanics employed under the direction or control of con-tractors or subcontractors, the latter being themselves directly responsible for any disregard of its provisions of which they may be guilty.

The Secretary of the Navy takes the position that under the eight-hour law he has no power to enforce the provisions of that law upon contractors and subcontractors doing work upon Government buildings. I disagree with the Secretary of the Navy entirely upon this subject. I have no doubt in my own mind that he has ample power by the language and the spirit and the evident policy of the law, but if he does not possess power and Congress desires to vitalize the law of 1892 and make it effectual, then it is proper for us to know to what extent the law is being violated by contractors and subcontractors, and what provisions, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy, would be essential to preserve the rights of labor.

Now, respecting P. J. Carlin, of whom the Senator from New Hampshire has spoken, I read from a letter written by Mr. Burns to John W. Hayes, the general secretary and treasurer of the Knights of Labor, dated December 19, 1896:

During the past week the contract for building the addition to the hospital, to cost, I believe, about $40,000, was awarded to P. J. Carlin, of this city—a firm that the board has been at odds with for some time. This may be very likely a subcontract from Walker & Sons, but am not sure, and if Carlin can work his men nine hours without interference, he will certainly do so. You can imagine what effect that will have on the firms who employ union men and pay the wages. It is the desire of the board that you should bring this matter before Congress.

So Carlin is either an independent contractor with the Government, the same as Walker & Sons, or he is a subcontractor from Walker & Sons, and in either event he is subject to the provisions of the act of August 1, 1892.

I do not desire to make any political capital at all; I am not inspired by any motive of that kind, but it seems idle that the Congress of the United States should pass laws from time to time respecting policies that are to be pursued by our Departments and yet a great Department officer, who has under his control thousands and possibly hundreds of thousands of men, certainly the disbursement of hundreds of thousands if not millions of dollars, should by inaction, in a negative way, if not in a positive manner, constantly, persistently, and without reason set at defiance those laws. Chief Justice Marshall said this was a Government of laws laws. Chief Justice Marshall said this was a Government of laws and not of men; and it was upon the supposition that law reigned supreme in the United States, or should reign supreme, that our Government was formed as a republic. And yet because these men who are compelled to labor for a dollar or a dollar and a half a day, struggling from early morning until late at night to support themselves and families, are made defenseless to a certain extent in consequence of their excessive physical labor, we find great officers of the Government neglecting the enforcement of the law and by that means impinging upon their rights. I do not know what conception a man can have of his obligation to discharge a great public duty conscientiously and to the interest of all involved who can sit down complacently and congratulate himself that he is a great statesman when he is not enforcing the laws made by the Congress of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Allen].

TERMS OF PRESIDENT AND REPRESENTATIVES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is now con-

Mr. STEWART. I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolutions introduced by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Proctor] in regard to certain amendments to the Constitution may be laid before the Senate. The joint resolutions were laid over yesterday before the Senate. The joint resolutions were laid over yesterday by unanimous consent. I was then about to make a few remarks on the subject, but yielded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent that the joint resolutions indicated by him may be laid before the Senate. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The joint resolutions will be stated by title.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. R. 180) providing that the Constitution of the United States be so amended that the President shall hold his office for one term of six years, and shall not be eligible for reelection, and a joint resolution (S. R. 181) providing that the Constitution of the United States be so amended that the members of the House of Representatives shall be chosen that the members of the House of Representatives shall be chosen wery third year.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words in reference to the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution to extend the term of the President of the United States from four to six years, and to limit the Executive to one term. So far as the limitation to one term is concerned, I am heartily in favor it. I believe that that has been the concensus of opinion among statesmen for many years, so much so that candidates for the Presidency have frequently pledged themselves that they would not be candidates for reelection. I think Mr. Cleveland, before he was elected the first time, made such a pledge in a rand, before he was elected the first time, made such a pledge in a very solemn manner and with the approval of the country.

The suggestion to extend the term to six years, however, is, to my mind, most objectionable. I would much prefer to have it limited to two years. The strain in electing a President for four years is about all the country can stand. The prize is too great, and the struggle we have just passed through shows what efforts are made to secure it. It is alleged that millions were expended, every engine of power was brought into requisition to secure the great prize of the Presidency. It must be remembered that the patronage is growing very rapidly. It has become an all-absorbing subject. The salaries were fixed when prices were much higher patronage is growing very rapidly. It has become an all-absorbing subject. The salaries were fixed when prices were much higher than now. The money now, in its purchasing power, is double as much as it was when those salaries were fixed. Times are hard; Government employment is a great boon, and it is sought after with a vigor that threatens the stability of the Government. If the elections could occur every two years, at the same time that Representatives in Congress are elected, the President would go into office in harmony with the Congress, and the will of the people would be expressed frequently and easily. There would be no great excitement. The elections would pass off quietly. I believe in trusting the people, to make this a despotism instead of a Republic, is manifested in every great struggle where the Presidential office is at stake. We know very well that other republics have failed over a disputed succession to the presidency. That was recognized by the framers of the Constitution as the great danger to this Republic. Some of the delegates to the Convention were afraid to have a president at all. It was a matter of great discussion. The term was finally limited to four years. If they had put in the other limitation, that a man should be eligible to but one term, it would have been better. If we had an election for President every two years, there would be no great struggle, and the people would submit for two years without making a contest which would destroy the Government. But if a six-year term is involved, there is great danger that a time will come—and it seems if human nature remains the same that the time will term is involved, there is great danger that a time will come—and test which would destroy the Government. But if a six-year term is involved, there is great danger that a time will come—and it seems, if human nature remains the same, that the time will come—when there will be such a struggle over the succession that it will destroy the Republic.

I hope there will be no effort to lengthen the term, making the danger greater at Presidential elections. Congressional elections pass off every two years without a ripple. Everybody submits; everybody acquiesces. If the Executive could be elected at the same time there would merely be a spirited election, and everybody would be satisfied to wait for two years. On the other hand, if you should make the term six years and a struggle should come on that would endanger the Republic, there would then be a clamor to continue to lengthen the term in order to avoid such danger. That is not the way to avoid political dangers in this country. The way to avoid political dangers is to trust the people, to go often to the people, and to let them know and feel that it is their Government and the Government which they control. Whenever you put this Government out of the control of the people, when you remove it from them, when you make it what you call conservative, you are moving toward despotism, and when you get it very conservative you will produce revolution.

I am a conservative in this respect. I am a conservative who trusts the people and believes in frequent elections. They disturb business less than elections at long periods, when great interests are involved. There is no danger if the neonle are consulted.

business less than elections at long periods, when great interests are involved. There is no danger if the people are consulted often that they will ruin their Government. They will preserve it. The oftener you take the public sentiment upon great questions the better for the Government, and the better for the preservation of free institutions.

I did not intend to elaborate upon this point at all, but I thought, inasmuch as the question was brought up, that this suggestion ought to be made.

Mr. PROCTOR. If there is no other Senator who wishes to be heard on the joint resolutions, I move that they be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That bill is now in order.

of the morning business. That bill is now in order.

Mr. McMILLAN. If there is no objection to House joint resolution 214, in regard to the inaugural ceremonies, reported yesterday by the present occupant of the chair [Mr. BACON], I should like to have it disposed of at this time.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I desire to have the unfinished business laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by title.

The Secretary. A bill (H. R. 3656) providing for free homesteads on the public lands in Oklahoma Territory for actual and bona fide settlers and reserving the public lands for that purpose.

Mr. McMILLAN. The Senator from South Dakota yields to me, I understand?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will yield if the joint resolution leads to no debate

Mr. McMILLAN. The joint resolution was read yesterday, and went over upon objection from the Senator from Kansas [Mr.

Peffer].

Mr. PEFFER. I do not object to the consideration of the joint resolution. I shall offer an amendment to it when it is taken up. I do not think it will lead to very much discussion.

Mr. PETTIGREW. If there is to be a controversy over the joint resolution I shall decline to yield.

Mr. PEFFER. I will state to the Senator from South Dakota that I do not think there will be a controversy. I wish to offer an amendment, and perhaps it will be accepted upon being mentioned. If not oned. If not—— Mr. PETTIGREW. I think I must insist upon proceeding with the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota declines to yield. The unfinished business is now before the Senate.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their represent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3656) providing for free homesteads on the public lands in Oklahoma Territory for actual and bona fide settlers and reserving the public lands for that purpose, the pending question being on the first amendment reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the rending amendment.

pending amendment.

The Secretary. In section 1, line 5, after the word "tribes,"

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the effect of the amendment? Let it be read in connection with the text.

The Secretary read as follows:

That all settlers under the homestead laws of the United States upon the public lands acquired by treaty or agreement from the various Indian tribes, who have or who shall hereafter reside upon the tract entered in good faith for the period required by existing law, shall be entitled to a patent for the land so entered, upon the payment to the local land officers of the usual and customary fees, and no other or further charge of any kind whatsoever shall be required from such settler to entitle him to a patent for the land covered by his entry.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, in section 1, line 15, after the word "entry," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, however, That all sums of money so released, which if not re-leased would belong to any Indian tribe, shall be paid to such Indian tribe by the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. This completes the amendments of the committee. The bill is open to amendment as in Committee of the Whole. If there be no further amendments, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. VILAS. I understand the Senator from Minnesota [Mr.

NELSON] wishes to take the floor to make some remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota had not indicated his purpose so to do.

Mr. VILAS. I should like to hear the Senator from Minnesota. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota had not addressed the Chair.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I understand the Senator from Minnesota has some remarks that he wishes to submit upon the bill.

Mr. VILAS. I so understand. However, I do not wish to intrude upon the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I am aware that considerable prejudice exists in the minds of some Senators in reference to the object and purport of the pending bill. I am satisfied if Senators could be induced to look at the subject-matter in its proper light, from the actual standpoint of the case and the actual facts of the case as they exist, the bill would have the unanimous support of this body.

In 1862 we adopted the free-homestead law. Under that law In 1862 we adopted the free-homestead law. Under that law thousands of acres were conferred upon active, intelligent, and enterprising settlers, who built up great States. Those lands were among the best lands in the entire borders of the United States, They were lands that we had acquired from the Indians, in one form or another, by treaty and purchase. They had all from first to last cost the United States large sums of money. Still we gave those, the very best of our lands, freely—as free as water—to the settlers on the frontier. The result is that great States have grown up from the adoption of that land policy. You may take a large portion of the State of Wisconsin, my own State, the State of Minnesota, the two Dakotas, Kansas, Nebraska, and most of the States to the west of those I have named, and they have all grown up under this liberal land policy.

up under this liberal land policy.

The lands which are still left, that are the subject-matter of the pending bill, are, so to speak, the mere remnants of our public domain. They are mere remnants in more senses than one. They are not only remnants as being the balances that are left of the large bodies of land that were once occupied and roamed over by large bodies of land that were once occupied and roamed over by the Indians, but they are remnants in the sense that they are the inferior and scrubbiest portion of our public domain.

Now, most of these lands, the lands in Oklahoma, the lands of the Big Sioux Reservation in Dakota, the lands in Montana, and the other reservations to the south and west, are within what is known as the arid belt of the country—lands that are of little value for agricultural purposes except with irrigation. They are lands which, if not occupied by homestead settlers, would be occupied by the cattle men and the sheep men.

Take the lands in my own State that once belonged to the Chipnewa Indians. These are to a large extent of the poorest and most

Take the lands in my own State that once belonged to the Chippewa Indians. These are to a large extent of the poorest and most inferior grade of lands in the State of Minnesota. The settlers who have gone there are of the very poorest class, so far as pecuniary means are concerned. The lands are in the extreme northern part of the State, and it is a very important matter to get them settled up and developed as soon as possible; and without offering inducements of this kind—that of free homesteads—these lands will settle up slowly and at great sacrifice and suffering to the will settle up slowly and at great sacrifice and suffering to the settlers, who are handicapped with poor lands, a northern zone, and the scantiest of means

The facts as reported by the Land Department in reference to these reservations do not entirely do the question justice. Take, for instance, in the State of Minnesota, the Chippewa Indian res ervations, which in that State are composed of two classes of land, divided by the act opening them for settlement into lands known as pine lands and agricultural lands. The lands that are known as pine lands are not subject to the provisions of this bill. On those lands the pine is examined, estimated, and appraised, and the lands are sold for cash at public sale, to the highest bidder, for not less than the appraised value, which can not in any case be less than $3 a thousand feet, board measure, for the pine on the land.

A large share of the reservations in Minnesota are of that class of lands which can not be affected by the provisions of the pending bill, because it is simply limited to homestead lands and homestead settlers. The part of the lands in Minnesota to which the bill applies does not exceed in all 2,000,000 acres. By the report made by the minority of the committee it is represented that there are between four and five million acres of those lands subject to homestead entry. That is a mistake. If you take out the lands that are still unceded, if you take out the lands that are subject to appraisal and sale under the pine-land provisions, there are scarcely more than 2,000,000 acres that would be subject to homestead entry, and a large portion of those lands are in the extreme northern part of the State on what is known as the Rainy Lake and Rainy River basin, the basin bordering on the Province of Manitoba upon the north. Much of the land is of a wet and swampy character.

Those lands were thrown open to settlers a year ago. There was a great rush of people up to that country. When they came there they found that a large extent of the lands were flooded and under water, and over 90 per cent of the settlers who had rushed to that water, and over 90 per cent of the settlers who had rushed to that country left and abandoned that region. The few people who finally concluded to stay there, and have settled there for the purpose of making homes, have the greatest trouble in the world to subsist and maintain themselves, and it is inflicting upon them a serious and heavy burden to compel them to pay for those, the poorest and most wretched lands that have been opened for settlement under the land laws in the State of Minnesota

Now take the lands in the other States. Most of them are of the class known as arid lands, and if they are not taken under the homestead law by homestead settlers, they are left undeveloped and untaxed, to be used simply as a range for the cattlemen.

I take it that it is for the interest of the country that these lands, poor as they are—the arid lands and the swampy and wet lands of the Red Lake reservations—be settled, cultivated, and improved, and be made into farms and homes for those who have no other means than their strong hands and stout hearts.

The price that is to be paid to the Indians for these lands is but small item. It will cut but a small figure in the aggregate of our disbursements. The Government will more than make up for what it will be compelled, under the pending bill, to pay the Indians for the lands, by their early settlement, by having the lands made productive, and by making them subject to taxation and the other burdens of government. It is better that the lands within the arid belt and the lands in the extreme northern part of our country bordering on the Rainy Lake region should be cultivated and occupied by settlers than that they should remain in the condition they are now in—that of an unsettled

Mr. President, after we have given away oceans of our best and most valuable lands to settlers under the homestead law, without money and without price, surely it would be an act of injustice, when it comes to the disposal of the mere remnants of the poorer and more inferior portions of our public domain, to load the settlers with a burden, a charge that we did not impose upon the settlers who got the better class of our public lands.

Take the Red Lake Reservation, in the State of Minnesota. There are perhaps about 2,000,000 acres in all that would come under the homestead features of the law. But of those I apprehend that not to exceed a million acres can possibly be settled and improved within the next ten years. By and by, in course of time, if a system of drainage is inaugurated connecting the head waters of Red Lake with the Rainy Lake region, perhaps good portions of that land may be opened to settlement and occupied by actual settlers; but years will elapse before this can be accomplished.

We are discussing in the public prints, our public officials are considering, and the question has been agitated here in Congress, what to do with our arid lands, how to promote their settlement and development. Mr. President, there is one way to promote the settlement and development of the arid lands. It is to push forward an army of pioneer homestead settlers by giving them this heavy of five horsesteads. That is one way of selections and forward an army of pioneer homestead settlers by giving them this bonus of free homesteads. That is one way of colonizing and settling a country that would otherwise for years remain a dreary waste. The same is also the case and true with the wet and overflowed lands in northern Minnesota to which I have called your attention. By and by it will be a question how to settle them. In the northern part of Minnesota, within recent years, the legislature of the State has expended thousands of dollars in draining wet lands in order that they can be opened to cultivation and tillage. The sooner we can develop and open such country, whether wet or arid, by public aid, State and national if need be, the sooner will our country reach that state of high development to which we all aspire.

The giving of free homesteads to the settlers who have gone on The giving of free homesteads to the settlers who have gone on these lands is simply a little bonus, a little encouragement to speed them and to fortify them in their task and mission. We give protection by means of a tariff, Mr. President, to the manufacturers, the producers, and the farmers. A few years ago, until it was repealed by the so-called Wilson law, we gave encouragement to the cane-sugar producers of Louisiana and the maple-sugar producers of New England and the beet-sugar producers of the West in the shape of a bounty of 2 cents per pound. In view of these facts it is no more than just and right that we should give the pioneers who go into the outer verge of civilization, into our frontier country, into this dreary waste of arid and wet land, this pittance of protection and encouragement that is afforded by free homesteads. This is a protective tariff that can come nearer to them and be more effective than any other.

What is a paltry amount of thirty or thirty-five million dollars to the great Government of the United States? And yet, Mr. President, to these settlers it is everything in the world. It does not begin to equal the amount of sugar bountles we paid under the McKinley Act. What is involved in this bill does not begin the McKinley Act. What is involved in this bill does not begin to equal the amount we are appropriating year by year for the improvement of our rivers and harbors. This is a great country. We must look after all its interests. It is just as much our duty to aid and assist these poor people on the frontier as it is to aid the large cities by improving their harbors, as it is to aid the manufacturer, the laboring man, the miner, the lumbermen, and the farmer, by means of a protective tariff. It seems to me that it is but just and proper that we should aid these poor settlers; and I farmer, by means of a protective tariff. It seems to me that it is but just and proper that we should aid these poor settlers; and I trust that you gentlemen who live here in the Eastern and Middle and older States, who enjoy the benefits of a protective tariff, and who hope to enjoy it in days to come in a more perfect degree, will accord this little tariff benefit to the poor settlers of the frontier. I think they are fairly entitled to it. I think it is a narrow policy to look upon this subject as a mere matter of dollars and cents.

Mr. President, there are some people who fancy that when you talk about public lands, when you talk about Indians, when you talk about pine lands and free homesteads, there must be of necessity some kind of a job in it, some kind of a land scheme. Why, in this little bill there is everything but a land scheme. What-ever there is in it is against the greatest of all land schemes that is possible in this country, and that is the scheme of the cattle kings, the scheme of occupying and using large areas of the public domain without taxes, without any color of title, without any attempt at improvement, simply utilizing them as a naked cattle range. They are the parties who would be benefited and interested by leaving these lands in the condition that they now are in—unimproved. The sooner we can get these lands occupied by bona fide homestead settlers, with their houses and barns, their little gardens, and their little fields, the sooner we can make them into cultivated farms, the better for the country. After we have given acres and acres of land to canal companies, to transportation companies, and to railroad companies, to companies that have become great monopolies, it comes with bad grace at this late day become great monopolies, it comes with bad grace at this late day to attempt a picayunish spirit of economy at the expense of a few pioneers on the frontier.

Mr. President, there is congestion in the labor world, and has been for more than three years past. Our laboring men are to-day swarming our large cities, idle, and with nothing to do. They are there helpless, a burden to themselves and to their surroundance. ings, many of them living in the most wretched state of poverty. What a blessing it would be if we could get all of those poor, idle men out on the frontier upon quarter sections of land, where they could in time make themselves happy homes, build railroads, churches, and schoolhouses, and develop the country!

Mr. President, we can surely afford to aid the laboring men; we can surely afford to relieve the congested labor situation of to-day this little petty bonus, by saving to them, "If by holding out this little petty bonus, by saying to them, "If you will only go out there on these reservations in Oklahoma, in the Dakotas, in Montana, in Minnesota, if you can pay your transportation to reach these places, Uncle Sam will give you 160 acres of land as a free home." Many of those people may be able to pay their transportation. They may be able to go there and build a little cabin; they may be able to buy an ox team, or a pair of ponies, and a cow or two, and get a breaking plow. They may in fact be able to buy a few of the necessaries that are required to start on the frontier. But when they have procured these things and paid their transportation, and landed on the quarter section where they intend to make their homes, they find themselves utterly empty in pocket, with no money to pay for the land. Now, when a poor man is able to leave the overcrowded city; is able to secure transportation; is able to make a start, but still lacks the requisite amount to pay for the land, would it not be a short-sighted policy, a poor policy, to say to him, "My poor fellow, you can not have what your more fortunate brethren had a generation ago; you can not have these lands unless you pay from a dollar and a quarter to a dollar and a half, or two dollars and a half an acre

Mr. President, the condition that is to-day confronting us did not confront us a generation ago as strongly and palpably as it does to-day, and why? Because we had the great West, the great undeveloped West, our great body of unsettled and undeveloped land, open to homestead settlers, and whenever the realm of labor became overcrowded, whenever there became want of employment and want of the became want of employment. ment and want of room for the laboring men in our large cities, they could wend their way to the great West, obtain Government homesteads, make themselves happy homes, and build up the country. And thus we were able to stave off the evil days that are now upon us.

flow to these settlers?

Mr. President, if these lands were of the kind and the quality Mr. President, if these lands were of the kind and the quality that we gave away as a free gift a generation ago, they would to-day be readily taken and paid for at this price; but the lands are the most inferior and poorest of all the lands of our public domain, and we shall, by and by, as I said a moment ago, have one problem to confront, and that is how best to get these arid and unsettled sections of the West, these waste lands, these poor lands, settled and occupied by homestead settlers.

and unsettled sections of the West, these waste lands, these poor lands, settled and occupied by homestead settlers.

There can be no monopoly in this measure, Mr. President. No one can get these lands except homestead settlers. They have to go there and make their homes, improve and settle and cultivate the land. The speculator, the land shark, can not do that. He does not want to get land in that way.

Even if we relieve those poor people from the burden of making this payment, they would still have to comply with the homestead laws in all other respects. Under our legislation the only practical way by which lands of this kind can now be obtained, I mean agricultural lands, is as homesteads under the homestead law.

These men still have to go there; still have to improve, settle, and cultivate the land, and live there five years, unless they are ready to pay for it. The settlers have still, if you relieve them from the burden of paying for those lands, to live on them five years, improve them, and cultivate them in order to obtain them free. No land shark, no speculator, no land schemer is going to do that. Under the provisions of the homestead law, requiring five years' settlement, improvement, and cultivation, none but bona fide settlers can get these lands.

I submit again, as I did a moment ago, that in view of the condition existing in this country at this time among laboring men, it ought to be the duty and it ought to be the inspiration of every statesmen to do all he can to encourage and aid the idle laboring men and mechanics to leave our large cities, go to the frontier, and make themselves homes. In no way can we aid them and encourage them to do this more practically, more effectively.

laboring men and mechanics to leave our large cities, go to the frontier, and make themselves homes. In no way can we aid them and encourage them to do this more practically, more effectively, more justly, than by giving them free homesteads without money and without price; and I appeal to you, my friends from the older States, who have had the benefits and advantages of a protective tariff; you who have had the benefits and advantages of a bounty upon your sugar; you who are not subject to the toils, tribulations, and annoyances of pioneer life; you who are our older and stronger brethren—I appeal to you under these circumstances and conditions to aid us in giving our people in the far West this little bonus, this little protection, and this little advantage contemplated by the amended bill. What will the paltry sum of thirty or forty million dollars in the course of time be to the great Government by the amended bill. What will the paltry sum of thirty or forty million dollars in the course of time be to the great Government of the United States as compared with the advantages which will

I hope, Mr. President, without taking up further time of the Senate, that Senators will look at this question, not from the narrow standpoint of the "almighty dollar," but from a broad, humanitarian standpoint; that they will look at it in its good results, that they will look at the question from the standpoint of how much good it will do for our poor, suffering, needy humanity. If they look at it in that light, I feel assured that this bill will pass with but few dissenting votes.

Mr. ALLIEN. Mr. President, I desire to offer but a word or pass with but lew dissenting votes.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I desire to offer but a word or two in support of the pending measure.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope the Senator will not do that.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is too late to object. The suggestion having once been made, it can not be withdrawn.

Mr. ALLEN. 1 thought possibly the Chair did not hear the

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I desire to offer but a very few words in support of the pending measure. I shall cast my vote for the passage of this bill, and I desire to detain the Senate long enough only to give some of the reasons that will actuate me in

It has been the policy of this nation to dispose of its public lands in aid of works of internal improvement on the supposition that actual settlement would result in greater good to the public than doling them out for a mere pittance. The reasoning applies with double force in the disposition of the public domain to homestead

Both of the old political parties possess a history on the subject of homesteads well worthy of consideration at this time.

In 1860 the Republican party declared in its national platform-That we protest against any sale or alienation to others of the public lands held by actual settlers, and against any view of the free-homestead policy which regards the settlers as paupers or suppliants for public bounty—

I call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] to that language-and we demand the passage by Congress of the complete and satisfactory homestead measure which has already passed the House.

In 1872 it was said by that party that-

We are opposed to further grants of the public lands to corporations and monopolies, and demand that the national domain be set apart for free homes for the people.

In 1876 the Republican party again said:

We reaffirm our opposition to further grants of the public lands to corporations and monopolies, and demand that the national domain be devoted to free homes for the people.

In 1884 it said:

The public lands are a heritage of the people of the United States, and should be reserved as far as possible for small holdings by settlers.

In 1888 the same party declared:

We reaffirm the policy of appropriating the public lands of the United States to be homesteads for American citizens and settlers, not aliens, which the Republican party established in 1862.

In 1892 it was declared:

We favor cession, subject to the homestead laws, of the arid public lands to the States and Territories in which they lie under such Congressional restric-tions as to disposition, reclamation, and occupancy by settlers as will secure the maximum benefits to the people.

In 1896 it said:

We believe in an immediate return to the free-homestead policy of the Republican party, and urge the passage by Congress of a satisfactory free-homestead measure such as has already passed the House and is now pending in the Senate.

At this point I think it advisable to call the attention of the Senate to the remarks of the Senator from Connecticut made in this body on the 7th of this month in discussing this question. On page 539 of the Congressional Record of that date this colloquial discussion took place:

On page 539 of the Congressional Record of that date this colloquial discussion took place:

Mr. Allen. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The Presiding Officer. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. Platt. Yes, sir.

Mr. Allen. I only wanted to call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut to the Republican platform of 1898 on this subject.

Mr. Platt. Do not undertake to break me up in that way. If it is anything about the Nez Perces, I shall yield.

Mr. Allen. Will the Senator permit me to read it in this connection?

Mr. Platt. It was read yesterday, and it has been alluded to several times since this matter was before the Senate.

Mr. Allen. It is as follows:

"We believe in an immediate return to the free-homestead policy of the Republican party, and urge the passage by Congress of a satisfactory free-homestead measure."

Referring to this identical bill.

Mr. Platt. If I am accused of violating any portion of the Republican platform, I prefer the accusation shall come from a member of my own party, rather than from members of other parties.

Mr. Allen. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, it is barely possible that a member of another party might be in a position to judge whether a Republican is living up to the faith of his party, or whether the platform was simply promulgated to deceive voters.

Mr. Platt. I may as well say one word on that subject, and I hope I may be able to get back to the Nez Perces Reservation, which I shall keep carefully in one corner of my brain while I am talking about another matter.

We all understand how matters creep into national platforms; and I venture to say that when that resolution and that platform was adopted there were not fifty delegates in the St. Louis convention who paid any attention to it or knew what it was about, or had any idea of what it involved.

Mr. Allen. But are they not bound by it?

And here is the remarkable language of the Senator from Conpecticut.

And here is the remarkable language of the Senator from Con-

Mr. Platt, I am not; and I think that before we get through the discussions of this Congress I shall be able to refer to some planks or resolutions in some of the Populist platforms, or the platforms of the party with which the Senator from Nebraska has acted since he broke into national politics, which he scarcely would feel like saying he was bound by.

The particular language, or perhaps I should say idea, to which I desire to call attention is the open declaration of the Senator from Connecticut that he is not bound by the plain declarations of his party platform, and the implied admission that this declaration in favor of free homes, in favor of this precise measure— because it was pending before Congress at the time the platform was adopted—has no force whatever, and was simply designed to mislead honest voters and obtain their votes upon the supposition that that was an honest declaration upon the part of the party which it intended to execute.

I have no desire at this time, Mr. President, to comment upon what I believe to be a very grave vice of American politics, and that is to be found in good men coming together in a convention and promulgating a platform in which certain doctrines are announced, with the distinct understanding at the time that the declarations have no force; that they are simply to be used as a means to lift the party into power, and when the party comes into power it is not bound to execute the doctrines as therein announced.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question? Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask him on what theory of morals he speaks of such people as "good men?"

Mr. ALLEN. I shall have to ask the Senator from Massachu-

Mr. ALLEN. I shall have to ask the Senator from Massachusetts to be a little more specific and definite in his question.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps I misunderstood the Senator, but I understood him to say that he was about to speak of a practice which prevailed in American politics by which "good men" got together and announced a platform containing a declaration for political purposes, and then said afterwards that it was merely together and announced a platform containing a declaration for political purposes, and then said afterwards that it was merely intended to carry the election and get people to support their candidate. Perhaps I have not quoted the Senator's exact language.

Mr. ALLEN. Perhaps I would better qualify the statement by saying "good men in all other respects."

Mr. HOAR. And scoundrels in that respect.

Mr. ALLEN. Not necessarily so.

Mr. HOAR. I should think so.

Mr. HOAR. I should think so.

Mr. ALLEN. Politicians in that respect.

Mr. HOAR. I should say scoundrels.

Mr. ALLEN. Possibly the Senator would. He is plainer in his language than I am. I do not intend to make the charge which the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, I suppose, would have me make if he could have his way about it—that all such men are scoundrels. I would not be guilty of a charge of that kind, but I say that a spirit has grown up in this country, and it has been practiced in the Republican party, according to the admission of the honorable Senator from Connecticut, of making declarations of great doctrines to be applied in the administration of our affairs and crystallized in the form of statutes when there is not the slightest purpose on the part of the persons when there is not the slightest purpose on the part of the persons who engage in formulating these doctrines and platforms that they shall ever become laws or be acted upon. It is a thing, Mr. President, to be deprecated, not to be commended or excused under any circumstances, and I was forcibly struck with this language of the Senator from Connecticut, whom I regard as one of the algorithms of American tetratory.

language of the Senator from Connecticut, whom I regard as one of the ablest and fairest of American statesmen.

The Democratic party also has a history on this subject of "free homes." In 1868 it declared that the public lands should be distributed as widely as possible among the people, and should be disposed of either under the preemption or homestead laws or sold in reasonable quantities, and to none but actual occupants, at the minimum price established by the Government.

In 1872 it advanced a step further, declaring that:

We are opposed to all further grants of lands to railroads or other corpora-tions. The public domain should be held sacred to actual settlers.

In 1880 it said that-

Public money and public credit for public purposes solely, and public land for actual settlers.

In 1884 the party said again:

We believe that the public land ought, as far as possible, to be kept as home-steads for actual settlers. * * *

In 1892 it was declared by them—
That every acre * * * shall be reclaimed and restored to the people.

In 1896 the party said:

The Democratic party believes in home rule, and that all public lands of the United States should be appropriated to the establishment of free homes for American citizens.

While this last declaration does not pronounce in favor of the pending measure, as the Republican platform of 1896 does, yet it was drafted and put out with the knowledge of those who participated in the Democratic national convention that such a measure was pending before Congress. The same policy respecting public lands has been repeatedly asserted by other political parties.

In 1872 the Labor Reform party declared—

That all public lands of the United States belong to the people and should not be sold to individuals nor granted to corporations, and should be held as a sacred trust for the benefit of the people, and should be granted the landless settlers only in amounts not to exceed 160 acres of land.

In 1876 the Prohibition party declared for

The appropriation of the public lands, in limited quantities, to actual settlers only.

In 1884 the Greenback party demanded the reclamation of public lands that had been granted to corporations where the terms of the grant had been unfulfilled, and said that they should be— Held as a sacred trust, to be granted only to actual settlers in limited quantities

In 1892 the Populist party said:

The land, including all the natural sources of wealth, is the heritage of the people, and should not be monopolized for speculative purposes, and allen ownership of land should be prohibited. All land now held by railroads and other corporations in excess of their actual needs and all lands now owned by aliens should be reclaimed by the Government and held for actual settlers only.

I call attention, Mr. President, to this splendid declaration of a great truth, that "the land, including all the natural sources of wealth, is the heritage of the people, and should not be monopolized for speculative purposes," or in any other form.

In 1896 it was said by that party:

We demand that bona fide settlers on all public lands be granted free homes, as provided in the national homestead law.

And upon that declaration, Mr. President, in fulfillment of the

And upon that declaration, Mr. President, in fulfillment of the requirements of the great political party to which I owe allegiance, I take my stand.

There is no difference, however, in the principle announced by the political parties. They have all demanded, down through the years from 1860 to the present, that the public lands of our country which were not fit for agricultural purposes should be held as a sacred trust for actual settlers; and now we are told for the as a sacred trust for actual settlers; and now we are told for the first time, after the Republican party has won a great victory on this with other declarations that it made, that this plank in the platform amounts to nothing; that the honorable Senator from Connecticut will not be bound by it; that it does not bind the party to which he belongs; and therefore, as a sequence of his position, it was made simply to mislead voters.

How do these declarations which I have just read from the Republican platform sound in comparison with this language of the Senator from Connecticut?

For seven or eight years Congress has recognized this policy, has acted upon it, and during the whole time there has not been a suggestion from any quarter in the United States that that was not what the Government ought to do-speaking of the policy of charging actual settlers so much per acre for those lands. In fact, there had never been a declaration from any authoritative source that there should be any other permanent policy pursued by this Government respecting the public lands than to open them to the poor and needy for homestead pur-lands than to open them to the poor and needy for homestead purposes. Every declaration of every political party had committed the party to that policy.

Now let me call attention to another thing, and I put my support of this bill above the mere question of the dollars and cents to this Government which there may be in the transaction at this time. What will become of these settlers whose interests are involved at this time if we are to pursue the grasping policy of requiring them to live up to the letter of the contract? I think it is quite evident to Congress, it is evident to the people of the United States, that those people can not live up to their contract. But the Senator from Connecticut seems to assume that they are anxious to recede from their contracts and anxious to throw themselves upon the Government and receive aid from it, as he themselves upon the Government and receive aid from it, as he puts it. He tells us that there has grown up in this country a disposition upon the part of certain citizens whenever the affairs of the world do not go to suit them and they meet with some difficulty in financial matters to appeal to the Congress and the Government for aid. Mr. President, if there is a spirit of that kind in this country outside of those who are constantly appealing to Congress to give protection to their industries by the imposition of additional tariff taxes, I do not know it. I do not know of such persons persons.

The honorable Senator from Connecticut spoke of paternalism, and he connected that expression with the people who are occupying the public lands. It has become quite common of late, when seeking to defeat a measure, to point out that it is paternalistic in its character, and by that means to hold it up to ridicule. I challenge the honorable Senator to point out a government on the face of the habitable globe now or in the past which was not or is not in its first conception paternalistic. Our Government is a paternalistic government in a qualified sense. The very fact that human beings come together and form a government for mutual protection, giving authority to congresses presidents and indeed numan beings come together and form a government for mutual protection, giving authority to congresses, presidents, and judges, is of itself evidence of paternalism in a qualified form. But I do not myself believe in that species of paternalism which would have the Government assume responsibility for all the misfortunes and financial ills of the individual. However, we have pursued this policy of opening our public domain to actual settlers, to homestead settlers, and why now, with the few remaining acres of land that is not highly desirable, should we change and require the settlers to pay $2.50 an acre? settlers to pay $2.50 an acre?

settlers to pay $2.50 an acre?

It will be impossible for the homestead settlers on these lands to pay their obligations to the United States; this fact is practically settled. They have not the means to do so, nor is it probable that they will be able to do so for many years to come, if ever; and the Government will be reduced to the necessity of expelling them from their homes, unless it shall see proper to pursue the policy that has been pursued in the past; and I know of no reason why it should not pursue that policy. Why should we, at this time in our national history, reverse the course that has been pursued by the Government respecting the opening and settlement of sued by the Government respecting the opening and settlement of our public lands, and especially as the lands we are now offering to settlers are not equal in value or productiveness to those heretofore given away?

It is claimed in the minority report that the Government would lose several million dollars if these lands are not paid for by the settlers, but the settlers can not pay for them, and therefore the loss must take place, whether they are permitted to occupy them or are expelled from them. But what is the loss of four or five million dollars in comparison to the potential loss to be sustained by the Government by hundreds of thousands of people being driven from their homes and becoming charges on the balance of the nation, by being deprived of earning their own living on these lands, even if it be of a very meager character? Good citizens can only be produced from men and women who have homes of their only be produced from men and women who have nomes of their own. A tenantry never make the most valuable citizenry of a country; being without homes and without the sacred memories that cluster around them, they are robbed of the inspiration that comes from owning a habitation, however humble and unpretentious it may be, while those who have homes, even though they may be of the most moderate kind, are usually citizens of resolute may be of the most moderate kind, are usually citizens of resolute character and determined purpose, and their homes are as sacred to them as the most pretentious palaces of the land. To such a people, ultimately, the nation must look for its defense in times of war, for the payment of taxes, and for the manifold services that are required of, and are essential to be rendered by, a people in support of their nation.

And looking at the question in this breed and are described.

And looking at the question in this broad and comprehensive light, I distinctly assert that the United States can not afford to drive these people from their homes, and all this, sir, apart from any sentiment that may attach to the question.

It should be remembered that these lands are distant from mar-any sentiment that may attach to the question.

It should be remembered that these lands are distant from market, and what little they produce is made very cheap and almost unsalable as a consequence of that fact, but their products will sustain life; they will feed the few animals they are able to raise, and after long and weary years of privation on the part of husband, wife, and children, a home may eventually be established and some of the comforts of life acquired.

There are other hardships incident to pioneer life, of which many of us can speak from personal knowledge. There are diseases incident to new and undeveloped countries that must be subdued and overcome, as we subdue and overcome the physical difficulties. There are obstacles to be found in the absence of church, school, and social privileges that must be overcome after years of perseverance and energy. Cities, towns, and homes must be constructed, churches and schools erected, after these citizens have taxed their property and their energies to the utmost. These are blessings that must be made by thrift, by economy, and by energy, and they should be considered by the Senate in determining whether this bill shall become a law or not. I leave out of view the question of mere "cent per cent" in this matter, and assert that we can not afford to higgle, dicker, and deal, as hucksters would, respecting the disposition of public lands. These lands must either be settled by a courageous class of American men and women who are willing to undergo the hardships of pioneer life in the erection of homes and the founding of communities, or they must be turned back to the public domain to remain an unbroken wilderness save as they may be used by cattle kings, who will must be turned back to the public domain to remain an unbroken wilderness, save as they may be used by cattle kings, who will pay nothing for their use.

Under such circumstances there is little doubt in my mind as to the course that reason and humanity dictate we should pursue. And what, in the event these people are turned from their homes, as they must be, if this bill is defeated, will become of the slight improvements they have made upon their lands? All the money they had when they began their settlement was invested in their homes, in breaking out a portion of the land, in building stables, sheds, yards, and pastures, and in the construction of other improvements that can not be taken with them if they shall be improvements that can not be taken with them if they shall be expelled. These improvements, in many instances, are of more actual value than the lands themselves. What will become of them? Are these poor and worthy people to lose the money and labor they have invested in the lands by our action, through no fault of their own? Is it not enough that they should be required to undergo the privations and dangers incident to life in a new country without being forced to lose the money they have invested in the forms and improvements and the time they have uncomin the farms and improvements and the time they have uncomplainingly devoted to the cultivation and building up of communities in an attempt to subdue a new country, grow crops, and establish commerce, and would not the benefit to be derived to the United States by the final conquering of this portion of our country, and the adoption of some means that will make it productive, be a thousandfold greater than the mere pittance that would be received from compelling these people to pay for their homesteads, if the amount can be squeezed out of them, or be expelled from them in consequence of lack of ability to pay?

Mr. President, there are no circumstances under which Congress

Mr. President, there are no circumstances under which Congress can afford to deprive these people of their homes. We can not commit such injustice in the eyes of an intelligent and God-fearing people. The settlers should be given a complete title by occupying and cultivating the lands the requisite length of time under the provisions of the general homestead act. Open these lands to actual settlers, and through the honest toil and privation of a brave and generous race, pioneers' homes will be built that will bless their owners, their posterity, and the Government that magnanimously gives them.

The declarations of the different political parties so repeatedly made and reiterated respecting the opening of the public domain to homestead settlement render it impossible for any of them to deny that the granting of free homes has become an established policy of the United States. Is this policy now to be reversed in the disposition of the semiarid lands of our country? The reasonthe disposition of the semiarid lands of our country? The reasoning underlying the granting of public lands in aid of works of ing underlying the granting of public lands in aid of works of internal improvement supports with more force the granting of our lands to private individuals and to actual settlers.

I place my support of this measure on higher ground than has yet been stated. The United States possesses the power to give its lands to actual settlers, and as the right to occupy the earth and draw sustenance from the soil is as complete and perfect in every individual as the right to enjoy the sunlight and the air, and is as indispensable and necessary for that matter to the maintenance. indispensable and necessary, for that matter, to the maintenance of life, a wise and judicious policy, and the dictates of duty, mingling with the merciful and just, prompt the adoption of this course. The world has become altogether too sordid and grasping, and now that we have reached the reign of bankruptcy and suicide, logical sequences of the financial policy recently adopted by the country, I believe it is wise for us to pause and retrace our steps as speedily as possible and enter on an era of unqualified justice to all.

Mr. PLATT. I suggest that there is not a quorum present.

swered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, this bill hardly seems to attract much interest, and yet it is a bill which proposes to surrender much interest, and yet it is a fill which proposes to surrender some $35,000,000 of money, according to the report of the Secretary of the Interior, in part at least now due to the United States upon contracts which have already been made between the Government and various individuals. It is due from the several individuals in small amounts, varying from $160 or less, perhaps, to as much as $400 or even $480 in amount. It is therefore a bill to bestow upon individuals these several sums of money which in as much as $400 or even $480 in amount. It is therefore a bill to bestow upon individuals these several sums of money which in the aggregate is very large.

It would seem to require strong reasons, granting the rightful power of Congress to do it at all, to justify its passage, and it is interesting to note what are the reasons proposed for the measure. So far as I have been able to discern by listening to the arguments of its friends, they are of a twofold character. One relates to a question of public policy. It is proposed to reverse, to repeal the laws which have been enacted during the last eight years in respect to the disposition of certain parts of the public domain, and it is said that this ought to be done as a matter of sound public policy, that the people should recur again to the principles of the homestead law and bestow these lands without money and without price upon them who have entered on the land for the purposes of settlement and making homes. The other reason is one based simply on alleged fact. It is contended that the various persons who have made these contracts with the United States are too poor to enable them to perform their contracts.

Now, a different method of consideration is required of these different reasons. The two ought not to be confused. If it is desired to reverse the policy which has been adopted during the last eight years, and to relinquish entirely the contracts which have been made with the United States under that policy, then necessarily it follows that the proposal of the Committee on Indian Affairs is a correct one, and that the policy should be extended to all cases of public land. But it seems to me worth while to consider with a little more care whether this policy ought to be reversed.

The homestead law was a very different thing from the proposal reversed.

The homestead law was a very different thing from the proposal The homestead law was a very different thing from the proposal which is now before the Senate, and the principles of the homestead law as it was originally enacted do not support the proposition now urged for adoption. At the time when the homestead law was first proposed the people of this country did not number one-half so many as at present compose its population. The public lands of the United States were wild, remote from civilization, lands of the United States were wild, remote from civilization, unprovided with roads or other means of easy communication, and the settler who was invited to experiment in the forests or upon the remote plains was challenged to a life of privation and hardship very different from that which exists in connection with the lands to which the pending bill relates.

The homestead law was one of the measures which arose out of the great contest between slavery and its opponents in this country, and if we recur to the arguments which were proposed in support of that law we do not by any means find in them the motives which really underlay the proposal of it at that time. The homestead law had its origin in that body of men who were known as Free Soilers, and the contest was a contest on the one hand for the establishment of free States and was resisted lest there should come to be an undue proportion in the arrangement of the Federal Union between the States which were free and the States which maintained the institution of slavery. The argument against the homestead law was at that time that it was unconstitutional, and the first homestead measure was vetoed by Mr. Buchanan on that ground among others, and his veto was sustained in the Senate. Yet that homestead bill proposed a paysustained in the Senate. Yet that homestead bill proposed a payment of 25 cents per acre by the homestead settler after he should have completed the term of years required to entitle him to the land. That price, the President said, was merely a nominal price, and hence in reality the question was whether the Congress of the United States possessed the power under the Constitution to bestow upon individuals the public property of the Government.

The homestead law was passed as an outcome of the great slavery controversy. It was passed in the first Congress which met after war was developed between sections of the country. But the principle upon which that law went was, as I have already said, very different from that now proposed. Then it invited the settler to enter upon lands which had no value except a prospective one, and in order that he should obtain the lands the settler was required by his labor, as well as by that of others like him, in privation, in suffering, even in peril, to furnish a consid-eration moving from him to the Government quite equal to the value of the land he would obtain in the end, and, on the other hand, the Government derived, by the action of the settlers in building up communities where it possessed only a wilderness, a consideration moving to the Government much exceeding the value of the lands which it bestowed.

value of the lands which it bestowed.

The conditions came to be very different by the year 1889. Indeed, some time before that period settlement had extended over the area of the UnitedStates. There were many reservations of Indians which were of excellent land. The value of that land in the market had already become established as a present, not a prospective, value. On all sides of such reservations settlement existed; railroads had been built; many of the reservations were traversed by trunk lines of railroads; there wanted nothing but the mere experiment to take them to realize at once an immediate. the mere opportunity to take them to realize at once an immediate the mere opportunity to take them to realize at once an immediate and present value, generally far exceeding the price which was proposed by the United States.

So Congress adopted a new policy, gradually coming to it, as such things are usually done. In the first place, Congress made such treaties as were made with the Osages in Kansas and with the Utes in Utah and Colorado. The Government undertook as trustee for the Indians to sell the lands to settlers at prices stipulated in the treaties and to receive into the Treasury of the United States the moduce of such sales and to hold it as a trust fund for States the produce of such sales, and to hold it as a trust fund for the Indians. That was the case with the Osages; and by that action the Government of the United States, as the mediator between that tribe and settlers who wanted their lands, obtained for the Indians a vast sum of money, sufficient to make that people to-day the richest people on the face of the earth, every Indian of that tribe being entitled to receive in the interest annually paid by the Government upon the trust funds a sum of money almost if not quite sufficient to support him; a family of that tribe, father and mother with three children, receiving annually about $800 in money from the Government, besides being possessed of an abundant farm, with house, and equipment of horse, wagon, and utensils for agriculture.

If the policy of a free homestead is to prevail, why should not the settlers in Kansas who paid for those lands be reimbursed by the United States?

The next step in the mediation between tribes and settlers covetously seeking the lands of the Indians was for the United States to agree directly with the Indians to pay them a specific price; and, on the other hand, to sell the lands directly to the settler. That was the course pursued in Oklahoma in respect to Indian reservations, and in Minnesota, in Oregon, Montana, and some other

The third policy was that adopted with reference to the Great Sioux Reservation. There the Government paid first a partial sum of money, $3,000,000, as an advancement on the price which the Indians should receive, and agreed that they should have all the residue over and above that sum which would result from the sales to settlers at prices stipulated, guaranteeing at least 50 cents per acre in ten years.

Now, let us observe for a moment the operation of this new policy: Take the case, for example, of the Cherokee Outlet. Before the Indian title, such as it was, to the lands in that strip, embracing about 6,000,000 acres, was extinguished, there was settlement on the south of it, settlement on the north of it, on the west of it, and on the eastern end was the Cherokee Nation, one of the Five Civilized Tribes, maintaining a government superior to anything which any other Indians except the Five Civilized Tribes have ever succeeded in attaining. That strip was already crossed by several trunk lines of railroads. The lands were described as being among the best lands of the United States; their fertility was universally lauded; and for years men who knew all about the circumstances pressed in great bodies to enter upon that property and enjoy it. The United States was obliged, in order to maintain its treaty with the Indians, to use its troops to repress the avidity of the settlers to take possession of that delectable land. table land.

After long negotiation, and after the application to those Indians of something very like governmental duress, they yielded their desire to retain their property and sold it to the United States, and the United States opened it to settlement upon condition that a new system of preemption should take the place of the former laws for preemption and sale. The old preemption law was repealed. That law provided that any person who wished to buy the lands of the United States might by first settling upon the lands of the United States might by first settling upon the lands, cultivating and improving them, and building a home, become entitled to buy at the fixed price. The new preemption law, which was passed in pursuance of the policy I have spoken of, was a wise one, calculated to be for the benefit of the honest settler. It gave, first, the right to buy those lands only to the genuine homesteader who should enter upon them, cultivate, and improve them, and reside there for five years. It thus gave that settler a chance as against the speculator. It gave that settler an opportunity to earn the money to pay for the land by a cultivation of it as his own for five years without the payment of local taxes.

Mr. President, that was a generous preemption law. At the time when it was devised for the Cherokee Outlet those lands were estimated to be worth, and I suppose they were worth, on an average, at least $5 per acre, perhaps $10, and in some instances more than $10 per acre; and yet it was proffered to the settler to choose his home of 160 acres, build his house, raise his crops, and at the end of five years of effort he had to accumulate on some of lands only $160; on other lands, $240; on other tracts he would be required to accumulate as much as $400. That was all that was asked of the settler, to save in five years' time money to that amount, in order to purchase a farm of 160 acres.

Mr. President, it seems to me that from every point of view that policy, instead of being repealed, ought to be maintained. Of course there may be a difference with respect to different tracts of land in different portions of the country. In some of the reservations, and I suppose that is true of the Great Sioux Reservation, there are lands of little value. Those the settlers for whose relief this bill is proposed did not select. They had the first pick of the land. The especial beneficiaries of this measure had the first land. The especial beneficiaries of this measure had the first choice in every case of the lands upon which they were to enter. They excluded by their choice others who were as eager as they to obtain the lands and pay the price. More than that, sir, to pass this bill now for their benefit would be a peculiar injustice to poor men who at that time would have been glad to take those lands if they had had the opportunity open to them then to take them without price.

without price.
Mr. PETTIGREW. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me a moment?

Mr. VILAS. Certainly.
Mr. PETTIGREW. There are 8,000,000 acres of these lands still untaken by anyone in the United States to which those people can go. There are several million across the have an opportunity to take lands.

Mr. PLATT. May I ask a question right there?

Mr. VILAS. Let me remark with reference to the Great Sioux min the State of South Dakota (extending also, I believe, into Nebraska and North Dakota), there are doubtless many bad lands. They are known as such and so marked on the map. They, however, are paid for at the price of but 50 cents per acre because of that fact. I suppose there are very few lands in fertile Oklahoma which have not already been taken.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to inquire whether it is not true with reference to the Great Sioux Reservation that the lands which control the grazing of that entire reservation have been entered upon under the law?

Mr. VILAS. I suppose it is true; but I will ask the Senator from South Dakota if that is not the case?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will answer the Senator by saying that

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will answer the Senator by saying that there are still large areas of this reservation containing water. I suppose that is what the Senator refers to.

Mr. PLATT. That is what I mean; whether there is water.

Mr. PETTIGREW. There are still large areas of it open to settlement under the law, and any citizen of the United States who has not had a homestead right can go there and take it. There are hundreds yet of those claims.

Mr. VILAS. On the question of fact which is urged in support of this measure I shall address some observations before I am through. I am speaking now generally of the question of policy, whether the United States should now reverse for the benefit of the settlers the policy which was devised originally for the benefit of their class, wisely devised for their benefit, as well as with justice to the public, and by which they have succeeded in obtaining possession of the very best lands which the United States offered for sale out of this tract of 33,000,000 acres.

Now, let us not confuse the question of fact with this question of policy. There lie in other parts of the United States still other Indian reservations which have not yet become the property of the United States except in its sovereign capacity. The proprietary title of the Indian there still remains in Indian ownership. Some of those lands are among the very best. In the State of Washington there are lands within one of the Indian reservations which I suppose are worth on an average from $50 to $75 per acre. which I suppose are worth on an average from $50 to $75 per acre. There are other lands within that Indian reservation (or were the last time my attention was attracted to it) which white men were striving to get, that were said to be worth very much more than that, even a thousand dollars per acre—lands within the reservathat, even a moderate control of Tacoma.

In many parts of the United States there still remain Indian lands which undoubtedly will eventually come into the possession lands which undoubtedly will eventually come into the possession of white owners that are of a present value far exceeding any price that was ever proposed to be charged to the settler. Are we to deny to the general public who will buy these lands of the Indians the right to have the price which they shall be compelled to give repaid by the settlers upon whom the right of purchase shall be bestowed, the Government being in truth only a mediator? This new species of preemption by a homestead settler, I repeat, is a most fair, generous, and beneficent provision; fair to the whole people of the United States, and considerate and beneficial to those who will have the advantage of it.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question.

a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. VILAS. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. Does the Senator desire to reverse the policy of his party, declared no later than July last? The party at that time, if the Senator will permit me, expressed itself in favor of the rending bill.

the pending bill.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, there was almost nothing in the platform to which the Senator alludes which I do not consider inimical to the welfare of the people of the United States.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to ask the Senator what platform he refers to? Mr. VILAS. I refer to the platform to which the Senator

Mr. PETTIGREW. I presume he alluded to the Republican platform, which I suppose the Senator from Wisconsin supported.

Mr. VILAS. Oh, no, sir; the Senator from Wisconsin, if we are to be diverted for a moment into party politics, supported the platform promulgated at Indianapolis, and if there be any Senator on this floor who can say that there is one word or line in it which is not based upon the sound, ancient faith of the Democratic party, I should like to hear him point it out.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The Senator, then, is opposed to a homestead law at all, under any circumstances? He is opposed to the giving away of the public domain to anyone?

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I am not called upon to enter into moot questions. The homestead law is a thing of the past. The homestead law has been practically repealed. All of the lands which are of desirability to settlers to be taken under the homestead law have nearly or quite been taken. The lands which were offered under the special acts of Congress to which the pending bill relates, and which the bill proposes to repeal, were in one bill relates, and which the bill proposes to repeal, were in one respect very different from those which were offered to settlers under the homestead law. They were lands which at the moment they were offered had a greater present value than was asked of the settler to be paid after he should occupy them for five years to earn the money.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me to

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me to read a couple of lines from the Democratic platform?
Mr. VILAS. The Senator from Nebraska can read anything he chooses from a Democratic platform, but if he is reading from the platform adopted at Chicago last summer as the Democratic platform, and reading it to me, I should prefer to ask his attention to the Democratic platform adopted at Indianapolis; and if he finds anything there on this subject which requires me to abandon the principles of the Constitution and in favor of bestowing this land upon settlers, I will yield to it.

Mr. ALLEN. I read from the regular Democratic platform. I do not read from the rump affair at Indianapolis:

to read anything he chooses on the subject, but I can neither adopt it nor pursue it as obligatory on me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ALLEN. Of course I have no desire unnecessarily to interfere or interrupt the Senator at all, but he is making some statements that do not bear analysis. If the Senator will let me pass from this point, upon which he seems to be a little tender, I wish from this point, upon which he seems to be a little tender, I wish to—

Mr. VILAS. Not the least; not the least tender.

Mr. ALLEN. I wish to call the Senator's attention to an important fact in this discussion, and possibly he may throw some light upon it. From 1867 to 1896 this country, through the instrumentality of the Republican party and the Democratic party, of which the Senator from Wisconsin was then a loyal member, donated to homestead settlers 157,878,796 acres of the finest land in the world. Now, the Senator says that we have established a new policy, which he does not want to see reversed. I want to know from the Senator from Wisconsin if by charging the settlers $2.50 an acre for these semiarid lands that have practically no value except for grazing purposes he is not inclined to abandon the tenets of the Democratic party and establish a new policy?

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I again wish to challenge the Senator's attention to the fact that he is confusing two things in his question. He is insisting upon the question of fact as being already settled in his favor that these are semiarid lands of no value. Thus he is throwing the question of value into consideration at this moment. I am not dealing with the question of what should be the policy of the United States with reference to such Indian reservations as we have sold under the several acts to which this bill relates, and such other Indian reservations as the United States still owns, which are of great value, worth much more in their immediate present market price than the price asked of the settlers.

Mr. ALLEN. But does the Senator pretend to claim that the settlers.

Mr. ALLEN. But does the Senator pretend to claim that the Government of the United States now owns as proprietor, or that the Indians own, any lands which are equivalent in fertility and value to the lands along the Missouri and Mississippi basins which were given away under the general homestead act?

Mr. VILAS. I think there are Indian tribes—

Mr. ALLEN. There may be exceptions.

Mr. VILAS. Which still own lands as good, perhaps, as any which have been relinquished; not a very great amount, perhaps, for we have been very rapidly extinguishing the Indian title.

Mr. ALLEN. But what I want to call the attention of the Senator to—and I hope he will not think I am unnecessarily captious in interrupting him—in interrupting him-

Mr. VILAS. Not at all.
Mr. ALLEN. Is the fact that these lands, as a whole, 90 per cent of them in round numbers, in consequence of the climate where they are located, in consequence of the lack of precipitawhere they are located, in consequence of the lack of precipitation in winter and in summer, are arid lands, as a rule, not fit for farming purposes; and are altogether inferior, I should say by 50 per cent, if not more, to the 157,000,000 acres that have been given away under the general homestead law.

Mr. VILAS. The Senator is again dealing with the second branch of this argument, which is a pure question of fact, and not with the question of policy as to how the Government shall dispose of valuable Indian reservations. I am going to deal with the question of fact presently the question of fact presently.

The lands in the Cherokee Outlet were, at the time it was opened. for settlement, held to be worth universally twice as much as was asked per acre of any settler. The Cherokee Outlet was lauded by Senators who wanted to obtain possession of it for settlers as among the very finest, most delectable, and fertile lands in this among the very finest, most delectable, and fertile lands in this country.

Mr. ALLEN. Has not the Senator visited the Cherokee Strip?
Mr. VILAS. No, sir. I am taking all my information in respect to it from credible testimony, and I shall presently discuss the question of the value of the land.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him for just a moment to make a suggestion?

Mr. VILAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator has not, he says, been to the Cherokee Strip. Should he ever go there he would find this to be true, that the soil itself is a fertile soil; there is no doubt about that; but aside from the little valleys along the creeks and rivers, which ion to the Democratic platform adopted at Indianapolis; and if the finds anything there on this subject which requires me to abandon the principles of the Constitution and in favor of bestowing his land upon settlers, I will yield to it.

Mr. ALLEN. I read from the regular Democratic platform. I o not read from the rump affair at Indianapolis:

The Democratic party—

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I yield with pleasure to the Senator

Mr. President, I yield with pleasure to the Senator

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, I yield with pleasure to the Senator

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to say that there are twenty one counties in western Kansas, lying right alongside of the Chero-kee Outlet, of which the Senator from Wisconsin is speaking, which had a population in 1887 of 101,000. Sixty thousand of them have moved away since that time and abandoned the lands to the people who held mortgages upon them, because of the fact that the rainfall was so light that they could not make a living upon the land, which, as I have said, adjoins this territory.

Mr. VILAS. I have heard that fact stated several times in the course of the debate, and I do not care particularly to challenge it; but I suspect there were a good many other reasons which have caused the population of that portion of Kansas to leave, if we were to inquire particularly into it. Political reasons have had their effect upon the prosperity of that State.

Mr. PETTIGREW. If the Senator will allow me, the population of the eastern part of the State of Kansas has increased 18,000 during the past year, while the western part, comprising these twenty-one counties, lost 21,000. So, instead of leaving the State when they could not make a living on this arid land, they preferred to make a living in another part of the State instead of moving to Wisconsin.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Wisconsin does not pretend that those people went over to Illinois and Ohio and voted the Republican ticket last fall, does he?

Mr. VILAS. The Senator from Wisconsin makes no pretense on the subject. He is perfectly satisfied with the intelligence on the subject. He is perfectly satisfied with the intelligence which was manifested by the vote of the people of his own State, and challenges no other State in the Union. I am not debating political matters. The Senator from South Dakota is not referring to the land to which this bill relates when he turns aside to discuss the question of the lands in Kansas.

Mr. ALLEN. Do I understand the Senator from Wisconsin to discuss the question of the lands in Kansas.

Mr. ALLEN. Do I understand the Senator from Wisconsin to state that he fully approves of the State of Wisconsin going Republican last fall? He seems to think it was an intelligent act.

Mr. VILAS. I most cordially approve of the decision of the people of the State of Wisconsin, by which a majority of nearly 110,000 in a voting population of about 425,000 was cast against a policy which, if it had been adopted, would, in my opinion, have worked great trouble and woe to the people of the United States.

Mr. ALLEN. Then the Senator approves of McKinley carrying that State and its vote being cast for McKinley's election?

Mr. VILAS. I do not intend to pursue a mere political contro-

Mr. VILAS. I do not intend to pursue a mere political controversy and indulge in partisan quips. I am discussing a measure of great public consequence to the people of the United States.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand, then, the Senator approves of disloyalty to his own party?

Mr. VILAS. I do most assuredly approve what I did. There is nothing about it which was done under cover, no step taken without careful reflection, and no act of mine in reference to the political affairs of the last year with which my conscience reproaches me in any way.

Mr. ALLEN. That is the same plea which Wat Tyler made a number of years ago.

Mr. VILAS. Mr. President, there may have been the same plea made by other men, perhaps during this year, who were no better than the person to whom the Senator alludes; but we have no occasion for that sort of discussion here. In the political affairs of the country I did my duty as I understood it; and I again say that if, in the declaration of principles which was enunciated at Indianapolis, there be any Democrat who can find one line or word that is not bottomed and founded on the ancient principles of that party, I shall be glad to hear what it is.

Mr. President, let us return to the subject that we have under

I have no desire to engage in the Senate in the badidiscussion. I have no desire to engage in the Senate in the paurage of politics. We have an important measure here proposed for adoption. I say that the policy which the Congress of the United States has adopted for the last eight years is a sound and right policy, just to the whole people, fair to the settlers, enabling them to obtain good lands, with a right of preemption so guarded in the circumstances which attend it as to secure its exercise by genuine and honest settlers, and to afford fair opportunity to earn upon the land the cost of it.

Now let us look to the other reason for a moment which is urged for this measure. It is said that these lands are semiarid, the "semi" being thrown in to apologize for classifying them as They have always been reckoned among the most fertile lands, and the Senator from Nebraska, who, I judge, has been there, could not hesitate in his acknowledgment that they are fertile lands. When these settlers went there they were supplied with railroads, while settlements and civilization embraced them on every hand. The lands were easy to develop. It was a simple thing to effect settlement there. Neither privation nor suffering nor remoteness from civilization was imposed upon those settlers. Sir, are they arid or are they semiarid? That is a question of fact. If we are to bestow these lands upon the homesteaders who have entered into contract with the Government to pay the $2.50 in some instances for the best land, and $1.50 for other land, and $1 only for still other land-if we are to repeal the laws under which they made their bargains because the lands are poor, worthless in value—ought we not to have proof of it furnished to us? If this bill is to be passed on a basis of fact, ought there not to be some inquiry into the truth of the assertions?

Is this Senate to assume that every acre of the 33,000,000 acres, some in Oklahoma, some in Minnesota, some in North Dakota, some in South Dakota, some in Montana, in Idaho, in Oregon, in Nebraska, that everywhere throughout the public domain all these lands that the United States offered for homestead preemption for a price, and which the settlers rushed on with such avidity to seize that they swept over the land like an army of occupation—is the Senate to assume that all these lands are worthless because somebody chooses to baptize them with the name of "semiarid"? Are we to yield perhaps $20,000,000 already contracted to be paid, $35,000,000 in the aggregate amount which Congress has justly expected to receive, and which the lands are worth upon the terms proposed—are we to yield that upon an assertion of fact, without a particle of evidence being produced to justify it, without discrimination between one body of those lands and another? I think the proposition a most extraordinary one.

What is the evidence on the subject? The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Platt] produced one piece of evidence to which we ought at least give some heed, the report of the governor of Oklahoma, made only during last summer, in which he does not intimate a particle of difficulty with the productiveness of those farming lands. On the contrary, in that report he sets forth the fact that they are especially productive of cotton and various other articles mentioned in the report, from which the farmers, he says, are deriving good returns in money. Who is it that gainsays this report of the governor of Oklahoma? Upon what testimony are we to surrender $15,000,000 due to us for purchases of land in Oklahoma? Not a word or scintilla of evidence is proffered to support assertions directly contrary to this report and to all that has heretofore been heard of these lands in Congress.

If that land is of the character which Senators would seem to arry the idea that it possesses, we had better, if we are to pass this bill, pass also another to repeal some of the measures which were taken at the last session of this body to secure possession of the remainder of the Indian Territory.

Think of it, sir! It is said here, or we are asked to believe here, that those lands are so poor that upon 160 acres the settler can not in five years save $160 to pay the price to the United States at which he was so eager to buy the land five years before; that he can not upon 160 acres of other lands, which were valued much higher and supposed to be worth $10 or even more per acre, in five years pay $400. If that is the character of the land in Oklahoma, let us proceed further with our work, and repeal the laws which we have been passing to break down the rights of the Five Civilized Tribes; let us recall the Dawes Commission, which is there now insisting upon some measures being taken by those governments to yield up the rights of the Indians solemnly guaranteed to them by the United States forever.

If the report of the governor of Oklahoma is not true, if these lands are indeed so poor and miserable that an honest settler on them can not in five years save $1 per acre with which to pay the United States the price he promised to pay, I think it would be better that he should leave, better that we should not try to maintain him there in pauperism and suffering; far better that the land should go back again to the Indian tribes who enjoyed a government of their own under which they had progressed to a very notable degree in civilization. If this be the true character of those lands, let us recall our Dawes Commission; let us repeal those laws by which we have put a tremendous duress upon those Indians in defiance of the treaty rights which were guaranteed to them; let us lower the legal bludgeon raised against them and maintain at least the good faith of the United States by leaving to them the occupancy and enjoyment of what this Government promised should be theirs forever.

Will the Senator permit me to make a suggestion Mr. PLATT.

at that point?
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. VILAS.

Yes, sir. In the Indian appropriation bill that has been Mr. PLATT. eported in the other branch of Congress is a provision to pay $2,000,000 to the Kiowa, Commanche, and Apache Indians to extinguish their title to the same character of land.

Mr. VILAS. If there had been produced a particle of testi-

Mr. VILAS. If there had been produced a particle of testimony to support the accusation against the nature of the Territory of Oklahoma, we might spend some little time in debating it, but I again put the question, Is the Senate to yield this vast sum of money, destroy all those contracts, repeal its policy, because somebody urges simply a statement of fact upon us without evidence? If we are to proceed upon the conditions of soil, upon the conditions of the settlers in different parts of the various States where these 38,000,000 acres lie, let us send out a commission of inquiry, let us know what the truth is.

With what justice shall we release to some and keep the money With what justice shall we release to some and keep the money which others have paid? Are we to assume that the same condition exists throughout the Territory of Oklahoma and thence to the State of Washington, throughout all these different bodies of land to which this bill relates? There may be special instances—I remember a statement made on the floor by the Senator from Montana who now occupies the chair [Mr. Carter]—there may be particular instances, such as were spoken of with reference to the Crow Reservation, where some relief may be due by reason of facts applicable to such cases. Let us distinguish those cases by facts applicable to such cases. Let us distinguish those cases by fair inquiry, and not pass a sweeping law of such injustice in its general nature as this.

I noted the reasons—a third class of reasons—given by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Nelson] this afternoon. He appeals to his political brethren who believe, as I do not, that it is lawful for the Congress of the United States to bestow bounties under the tariff law, either directly in money, as was done to the sugar planters, or indirectly in other sums still more enormous, as is done every day by the operation of the tariff laws, to manufacturers-to give the settlers a share, and on that basis it may be an appeal can be made to share this plunder of the public; upon that basis it may well perhaps be claimed by Senators who are willing to support the tariff iniquities perpetrated upon the people of this country that these Government debtors ought to participate in the division of the spoil which the "confederacy of rapine" secures from the United States. Why, then, do we not also provide for irrigating those lands at the expense of the Government? Why not supply these poor homestead settlers with the water at public cost, which shall make these fertile lands blossom with the riches of productiveness:

Mr. President, it may be quite useless to mention another consideration, for I am perhaps in the class the Senator from Connecticut rates himself as possibly belonging to, that of old fogies. I am still one of those who believe that the Constitution of the United States imposes upon legislators in this body an obligation to observe the principles upon which it is based. I still believe that the Constitution of the United States gives this body no right to enact a law unless you can find within its terms the distinct and direct authority to enact it, or a just and rightful implication from some power given.

I understand this Government to be one of delegated powers, and I know of no line of the Constitution which warrants this body in bestowing the public moneys gratuitously upon any class of persons whatever. If this bill is to be enacted, then in justice to those who have paid for their lands under similar legislation it would be incumbent on Congress to take from the Treasury the money they paid in there and restore it to them from whom it has been taken. What difference can you draw between surrendering a promise to pay by a debtor of the United States, made upon sufficient consideration, which he is able to keep and ought to keep by every reason which enters into the obligation of contracts, and by every reason which enters into the obligation of contracts, and taking the money directly from the Treasury? It can be done by no authority which the Constitution of the United States has vested in this body.

As I said, sir, in the beginning of the argument, the original homestead law was challenged for that reason. The Democratic party withstood the enactment of the homestead law upon that foundation; a President of the United States vetoed the bill because it was a reconstitutional and wat we are scaling here to find cause it was unconstitutional, and yet we are seeking here to find a power not to invite settlers upon a wild domain in order to build up States—we are seeking to find a power which shall authorize us to surrender moneys promised to be paid upon a fair contract for a fair and just consideration, and in respect of which no sort of complaint is or can be made, except a general assertion that they are poor and do not want to pay.

Mr. President, I leave the question there, having said more than I intended when I took the floor.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, before the pending bill is disposed of I wish to offer a suggestion or two. In the first place, these people and their friends in Congress are not asking alms at the hands of the Government of the United States. They are not asking a donation of money. They are not asking an appropriation of money from the Treasury of the country. They are simply asking that they may be permitted to enjoy the benefits of the homestead law. The object of that law was to procure and to secure homes for the people. The battle cry of the young Republicans thirty-six years ago last fall was "Lands for the landless and homes for the homeless." The theory of American government, the philosophy of American society, is that where the people have homes of their own they are bound to the soil by ties of ownership, which breeds loyalty, perpetuates patriotism, and will conosed of I wish to offer a suggestion or two. In the first place, ership, which breeds loyalty, perpetuates patriotism, and will continue the Republic down through the ages to come. The philosophy of our whole social system is based upon the homes of the people. The homes are the nurseries of the Republic. There is where the most sacred relations of life are formed. There is where republicanism is taught in its infancy and in its purity, and there is where the principles of republican and popular institutions are first taught to the young citizen.

Mr. President, the people who are asking that they may be relieved from the payment of debts which they find themselves relieved from the payment of debts which they find themselves unable to pay have not done so until they discovered their utter inability to complete those payments. When a debtor is unable to meet his pecuniary obligations, courts are called to the assistance of the creditor; the laws and the machinery of the courts are put into action; the property of the debtor is seized, and he may be destroyed, he and his family may be turned out of their home that the creditor may be saved. So it would be in this case. If these people, being unable to pay the obligations which have been imposed upon them by Congress, remain unable to pay the Gov. imposed upon them by Congress, remain unable to pay, the Government would simply have to remove them. That would be all. The Government would save nothing; it would make nothing, but a number of the best people in the world would be turned out of their homes and no good accomplished in any direction.

Now, our attention has been called by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Platt] and also by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS], who has just left the floor, to the message of the governor of Oklahoma, who speaks in very high terms of the Territory and its natural resources. Men who have been long resident in the Western country understand the force of messages of that character. The people of Oklahoma are now in the advertising stage, if I may use that expression. We have all passed through a fever of that kind, and if a governor can be found in a new State or even in an old State anywhere who would not defend his State and put its best possible condition forward and conceal the worst ones, he would not be elected to office a second time, certainly.

In the earlier stages of the Oklahoma excitement that Territory was pictured to the world as a sort of second-hand Eden. So it was in Nebraska, so it was in Kansas, so it was in Montana, so it was in Idaho, and in all the new States. I remember that in the earlier history of Kansas our State board of agriculture published earlier history of Kansas our State board of agriculture published a large volume every year in which maps of our counties were given; the county seats were located; the townships and principal towns and the railroads and streams were all given on beautifully colored maps. Those works were almost wholly, I might say wholly, for advertising purposes. The railway companies came to our assistance and spread broadcast advertising literature throughout all the nations of the world from which it would be likely that emigrants would come to us. In the last report, recently published, I discover, very much to the credit of the secretary and the board, that the policy has been changed, and the secretary takes occasion in the opening to call attention to the fact that he is occasion in the opening to call attention to the fact that he is now proceeding to look after the interests of agriculture and not so much to advertising. The plain truth is known concerning the Western country to all of us who are resident there. We are better able, because of our knowledge, to speak advisedly about these matters than are persons who are not familiar with them.

Now, it is charged that it is paternalism to relieve those people of their indebtedness, and yet we have time and time again donated lands by the thousands and hundreds of thousands and by the millions of acres to railway companies, ostensibly for the purpose of operating as pioneers to open settlement, to direct the course of population to these newer regions. We paid them for doing it. Six years ago we passed a law providing for the payment of bounties to such of our citizens as would engage in the manufacture of Sugar. Our object in that instance was to establish the industry. We proposed to pay for it. So, in the laying out of railways into the new Territories, we were paying the companies to do the work. We gave nearly 28,000,000 acres of land—more than twice as much as there is in the whole State of Kansas—to the Union Pacific Railroad Company alone, for the purpose of paying the company to build a railway across the country.

We made appropriations, I have forgotten now the number, but a large number, in the earlier history of the Republic for the opening and the construction of national roads from the city of Washington. ington. Roads were projected to Maine, one to Buffalo, and another one through Wheeling and Cincinnati and through various other one through wheeling and Chrimmati and through various towns in Ohio to St. Louis and on west. There were two others to the southwest, diverging somewhere about Louisville or Nashville, one going farther south and the other one farther west. I have gone through the record, but I do not now recall the number of appropriations or the exact amount of money set apart, but there were a great many of them.

So it has been in our manufacturing industries. voted large sums of money by way of protective tariffs to encourage our national industries. One of the first acts, indeed I believe it was the first general act approved by the first President of the United States, was a tariff act "to protect and encourage domestic manufactures" manufactures.

The Senator from Wisconsin argued, and it was urged, I think, by the Senator from Connecticut, that if this policy is now to be pursued, if the pending bill is to become a law, therefore, in justice to the citizens who have in the past paid for lands, the Government should refund the amount of money they have paid. Mr. President, a philosophy of that kind would overturn the structure of Government. When a court reverses its decision, is there any law, is there any custom, is there any rule, either of law or practice, by which persons who have in the past time lost property, character, or reputation by reason of the decisions of courts that are now reversed are reimbursed or by which their property is are now reversed are reimbursed or by which their property is restored? The idea is utterly impracticable. In the march of restored? The idea is utterly impracticable. In the march of progress there are constantly wrecks of fortune and of property left in the way. We can not account for those things. It would be a recoupment that would destroy every government under heaven. The way from the grain cradle to the combined mower and reaper has been one of loss. The way from the wheelbarrow to the railway car has been one of loss and destruction, but we can not store to the account of these things and to make good the can not stop to take account of those things and to make good the can not stop to take account of those things and to make good the losses which have occurred as society is moving forward.

It is charged that this is paternalism, that we are establishing a system by which when men become troubled in their financial affairs they may appeal to the Government, which will take them in its gentle arms and care for them in the future as the shepherd does his lambs. That is not the theory of this bill, Mr. President. Government is paternalism. Government ought to be paternalism. It is made for the purpose of taking care of the interests of the people. Shall we abolish our splendid postal system because it is paternalistic in its character? Shall we give out the carrying of our mails by private contracts? If you go up and down our broad streets you will see daily and hourly a two-horse wagon, nicely arranged, with two or three men on the inside of the box, busy assorting mail as they go up and down the street. It stops at the boxes along the principal streets of the city, the men gather the mail, and then distribute it for the proper points of destination. That is the hand of the Government operating in the people's That is the hand of the Government operating in the people's business for their interest. That is paternalism. Are we to abolish that?

You may go into any State of the Union, you may go to the statutes of any of our States, you may go to the ordinances of our cities, and you will find that the individual conduct of the citicities, and you will find that the individual conduct of the citizens, the personal habits of the people as to their buildings, and in many instances as to their clothing, and as to their modes of living, are regulated. Those things are necessary in the structure of society, in the maintenance of order, in the enforcement of discipline, in the preservation of health. All those things are natural in their order, and yet when people come to the Government and ask for relief it is called paternalism.

Look at our own records here. Day by day pension bills in large numbers are passed, and I dare say that more than 25 per cent of the bills that are read from the Clerk's desk are pension cases. Is it paternalism that this good-hearted people should take care of the needy ones? Are you going to destroy the people? Are you going to slaughter the children as they come into the world, so that we shall not be expected to care for them in time of need?

I believe that men and women have a right to the soil. I believe they have a right to live where they were born. I believe that men and women have just as much right to the soil as they have to the sunlight and water and to the air they breathe. These are God's bounties given to men for our use and enjoyment. If are God's bounties given to men for our use and enjoyment. If this be paternalism, what will the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar] think about it when he calls up the bankruptcy bill? During the last two or three days he has been urging the Senate to take up that bill for consideration. There are people by the thousands and hundreds of thousands all over the country who have become embarrassed and unfortunate in their business. thousands and hundreds of thousands all over the country who have become embarrassed and unfortunate in their business, unable to pay their debts, and now they appeal to the same Government that the people in Oklahoma are appealing to. They do not ask for a donation; they do not ask that the Government shall reach its hand into the Treasury and pour money into the laps of the unfortunate, but simply that they may be relieved from their debt burdens, that the great heart of a mighty people, feeling out through its arms of power, will take up these unfortunate ones and set them on their feet again. That is all that is asked for by the pending bill the pending bill.

The Senator from Wisconsin says that the homestead law is practically repealed by our recent course of legislation and conduct. If that be true, it is time that we retrace our steps and get back again to the principle of the homestead law—lands for the landless and homes for the homeless.

Attention is called from different directions to Kansas settlers. Attention is called from different directions to Kansas settlers, and the Senator from Wisconsin in his eloquent address reminded the Senate that a great many citizens of Kansas are now living upon lands that were in the beginning Indian lands. That is true; and no one there is asking to be relieved. No one in Kansas has ever asked to be relieved in that respect. The only requests that have ever come to Congress from the people of Kansas for relief were of the same character as those that came from Nebraska, that came from Colorado, that came from the settlers on public lands everywhere in the great West and the Northwest—that when misfortunes and drought or other unavoidable misfortunes came in the pathway of the settler, the time for payment on lands might be extended; and it has been done time and time again.

That is all they have ever asked.

But, Mr. President, there are two classes of lands in all that magnificent region in the midst of which Kansas happens to be located. The eastern portion of that country from the north to the south has more regular seasons and greater rainfall than the the south has more regular seasons and greater rainfall than the western section. A record has been kept by the officers of our State University in Kansas for a number of years, running back more than thirty years, if I remember it correctly, and the average rainfall in the eastern one-third of our State has been about 36 inches, or 3 feet, to the year, an abundance of rainfall; whereas in the southwestern portion of our State near the western border, at Fort Dodge, where the Government has been keeping records for many years, it appears that the average rainfall is about 10 inches to the year, and from that to 15 inches.

If that quantity of rain would fall upon the soil at just such times as the farmer most needs it, it would be enough to mature all the crops that grow well in that region of the country. But the rains do not come just at the times when the farmers most the rains do not come just at the times when the farmers most need them. It is for that reason that agriculture in the western portion of our State and the western portion of Nebraska and all that region north and south is more or less precarious, and we have found in our experience that farming and agriculture in general in the western portion of the State has not been in the main profitable. But where men with large means were able to procure water from under the surface by pumping it, or where they were able to draw water from the streams and carry it through irrigating ditches onto their farms, they have uniformly been prosperous. I have never seen better crops of any kind, and especially of fruit and vegetables, than are grown in the semiarid regions of western Kansas under irrigating ditches. I have seen readers the grown that the semiarid regions of western Kansas under irrigating ditches. regions of western Kansas under irrigating ditches. I have seen gardens—the gardens of women who were keeping boarding houses in villages—that were as oases in the desert, while the prairies around were gray and brown and sere; and in the hot simmering sunshine those gardens were green with vegetation, made so by reason of an abundance of water brought from under the surface by pumping. So it is that large numbers of people in all that semiarid region have found it necessary, in order to save themselves and their families, to move away in times of trouble and to go to other places.

In the earlier history of Kansas settlement nearly all of the Indian lands that were purchased from the Indians were paid for at the time of purchase either by money belonging to the purchaser as lands that were purchased from the Indians were paid for at the time of purchase either by money belonging to the purchaser as his own or by money borrowed from others. It was common at that time, as it has been in every one of the newer States, for loan agencies to be established in all parts of the country. You might go into a town of 200 or 300 people, and among the business signs you would see quite as numerously as any others those of the loan agents—"money loaned," "bonds bought and sold," "mortgages negotiated," etc. There was a mortgage period throughout all that Western region, and during that time the lending of money was a regular business. Men came from the East and from the South and from the Northeast, and some of our own citizens became South and from the Northeast, and some of our own citizens became agents for Eastern money lenders and started up in business, urging people to borrow money. All of those lands, I say, or nearly all of them, were paid for in one way or another; but you have never yet found a citizen of Kansas coming to Congress asking for relief from any of that class of burdens, and, Mr. President, you never will.

These homestead settlers in Oklahoma did not go there in the condition in which our Kansas settlers came to us. Our Research settlers were nearly all well-to-do people. They either had money of their own or they were energetic, enterprising people and borrowed money. But the homestead settlers in Oklahoma went there near they were poor when they crossed the border. They condition in which our Kansas settlers came to us. Our Kansas rowed money. But the homestead settlers in Oklahoma went there poor. They were poor when they crossed the border. They were poor when they lay along the line for weeks and months waiting for the hand of the clock to point to the hour of 12 on a certain day when they might rush across the line and procure homes. After having settled upon the lands, and finding that by reason of climatic conditions they are unable to raise money enough to meet the payments to the Government when they are due, and at the same time to maintain their own families and to meet the demands that are made upon them by reason of the social sur-roundings, they come to Congress, and honestly, not in a spirit of suppliance, not as beggars, ask to be relieved, exactly the same as men who are unfortunate in other lines of business come and ask men who are unfortunate in other lines of business come and ask to be relieved through bankruptcy laws.

When I plead the cause of these people I do it not as a suppliant. I ask it as an act of justice due these people. Suppose the pending bill is not passed and the people are compelled to leave their homes. Who will be the gainer? The people who are now there are acclimated. They know what they can do, and by perseverance, energy, and a little act of justice upon the part of the Government they will yet improve their lands, save their homes, and become good citizens of the Republic.

When it was suggested by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. When it was suggested by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. Pettigrew] that a large number of the present residents of Oklahoma and upon this particular portion of territory had gone there from the State of Kansas, the Senator from Wisconsin, in the goodness of his heart, expressed the thought that possibly political considerations had something to do with that fact. I regret very much that the Senator did not proceed to explain what he meant by political considerations; how he meant to apply his thought. Whether it was that men regarded the going into the Territory as notificial movement for their political preferment. I do not know I rather think, however, that the Senator's thought was running along the lines that were preached to us during the last year; that is, that the people of Kansas had become infatuated with a sort of political mania, with a view of revolutionizing the State government and the National Government and throwing themselves ment and the National Government and throwing themselves upon the country by repudiating their debts.

Now, in that connection and in answer to that charge, I wish to have something inserted in the Record. If the Senate will not object, I ask that the Secretary may read it. It is a printed letter by Mr. P. I. Bonebrake, one of the most conspictious citizens of Kansas. He is president of the Central National Bank, of Topeka. He was for eight years clerk of Shawnee County, in which the capital is situated. He was afterwards four years or more auditor capital is situated. He was afterwards four years or more auditor of the State, and he is to-day one of our most respected citizens. While this nonsense was going on about the repudiators of Kansas and what would take place when the new Populist administration came into power, Mr. Bonebrake wrote this letter, which I ask may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. PEFFER. Before the Secretary reads, I am asked by a Senator on my right whether Mr. Bonebrake is a Populist. No, Mr. President, he is a radical Republican of the old-fashioned abolition stamp.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. President, he is a radical Republican of the old-fashioned abolition stamp.

The Secretary read as follows:

The following is a copy of the letter sent by P. I. Bonebrake, president of the Central National Bank, to Governor Woodbury, of Vermont, relating to Kansas affairs:

"At the request of your friend, Mr. E. B. Merriam, I submit to you a few thoughts on affairs in Kansas. I know that Eastern parties who have investments in Kansas are anxions about their outcome.

"This anxiety is induced much more by assaults on the State by Eastern papers than because of the actual result of the election. I beg to say that we are not all cranks nor repudiators, nor has Kansas 'gone to the dogs' yet. We still have the same climate and soil that in one year produced 70,000,000 bushels of wheat, 207,000,000 of corn, more beef and pork than any State in the Union, while all lesser cereals, vegetables, and fruit have kept pace therewith. We still have 9,023.6 miles of railroad in the State; $35,500,023.23 of property as taxed, with a real value of three times that amount, with a State debt of only $256,000; a permanent school fund of $0,057,634.15; an annual disbursement of $430,122.05 to the common schools; 9,180 schoolhouses, valued at $10,980,031, with a university, normal school, agricultural college, institutions for the blind, deaf and dumb, insane, penitentiary, reform school, Soldiers' Home, soldiers' orphans home, and State capital, all costing $8,230,23, without the equipments. From this it will be seen that the State can and will continue to do business

"It is undoubtedly true that the result of the election will largely stop permanent investments of Eastern money. Had this been done the or officen years ago it would have been a bless, East and West, chased the people over years ago it would have been a bless, East and West, chased the people over the properties of the Mississippi and north of Mason, and Dixon's line. It is a slander on our fathers and mothers, most of whom yet live in the "had times" that preva

a billion was better. They were instance, the manded of the state of the state. If they do that, they will be quickly 'turned down' in the state. If they do that, they will be quickly 'turned down' in the state.

"I am a lifelong Republican, and have been connected with the management of every campaign in this State for twenty years, and have no sympathy with the 'isms' of any party, but when the integrity, intelligence, loyalty, and patrictism of the whole people of Kansas is assailed, I am always ready to 'stand up for Kansas.'

"As to your investments in Kansas, as stated to me by your friend, they are as secure as a bond of the State of Vermont.

"Yours, truly,

"P. I. BONEBRAKE."

"P. I. BONEBRAKE."

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas, if he will allow me, whether that statement of the wealth and resources will allow me, whether that statement of the wealth and resources of the State is, in his judgment, substantially correct?

Mr. PEFFER. I think it is, sir. The writer is one of the most careful, painstaking citizens we have.

Mr. HOAR. Then it is true, is it not, that Kansas is one of the most remarkable examples of the rapid and great prosperity of an agricultural population that exists in human history?

Mr. PEFFER. The statement of the writer is to the same effect that careful and the same effect.

Mr. PEFFER. The statement of the writer is to the same effect that any similar statement would be in a general way. He gives the figures of our population; he gives the figures of our production, as to our railways, and our agricultural production; he refers to one year when we produced upward of 70,000,000 bushels of wheat; to another year when we produced in the neighborhood of 250,000,000 bushels of corn; he speaks of our live stock. That is a statement embracing the whole State of Kanssa.

Now I was saving a moment ago, and it is.—

statement embracing the whole State of Kansas.

Now, I was saying a moment ago, and it is—
Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me?
Mr. PEFFER. Pardon me a moment. If the Senator will read it carefully, when he sees the letter in the RECORD, he will discover that there was a time in our history when our State was overrun with loan agents. You will find a passage that is marked in my own hand, if you will examine the original slip, where reference is made to that fact; and Mr. Bonebrake goes so far as to say that it would have been better for us now if some years ago our wild progress had been checked.

our wild progress had been checked.

Mr. HOAR. This is what I want to ask the Senator: Kansas Mr. HOAR. This is what I want to ask the Senator: Kansas was forty years ago—forty-two years ago, certainly—with the exception of a very few settlements, an uninhabited waste, roamed over by tribes of Indians. Now, does the Senator know another instance on the face of the earth, unless it be some neighboring American State, where a territory has grown up in forty-two years containing such a population, such wealth, such value of agricultural lands, such vast agricultural products, and the money-makers of the earth chasing them to get them to borrow their money? I should like to know if there is another instance of such prosperity.

of such prosperity.

Mr. PEFFER. I have frequently said on this floor, Mr. President, and I now repeat, that to take the people of Kansas as a whole, and the State of Kansas as a State, they have no parallel whole, and the State of Kansas as a State, they have in human history.

Mr. HOAR. Now, would it not—

Mr. PEFFER. I hope the Senator will allow me to get through with my statement, so that it may be properly expressed.

Mr. HOAR. Certainly; I do not wish to disturb the Senator.

Mr. PEFFER. This chopping up of ideas never serves a good

Mr. PEFFER. This chopping up of ideas never serves a good purpose upon either hand.

Our people have grown in about thirty-five years from a mere handful of squatters to in the neighborhood of a million and a half of people. When I went to Kansas in 1870, we had but a few miles of railway. I remember riding out from Topeka 18 miles on the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe road to the end of it. I went from there to Emporia, in the adjoining county, riding on a stagecoach drawn by four horses. From that place, the next day, I went down to the second adjoining county in a two-horse math lack, and the third day, going to another adjoining county. mail hack, and the third day, going to another adjoining county, I rode an Indian pony. The farther I got, the nearer I approached the Indian country, the less comfortable and the less capacious were the means of transportation.

Well, we have grown until now we have nearly 10,000 miles of railway. We have upward of 9,000 schoolhouses. Our churches afford a seating capacity for more than 25 per cent of the people. afford a seating capacity for more than 25 per cent of the people. Ninety out of every hundred of the people are native-born citizens of the United States. And in what we call good crop years we produce enormous crops of wheat and corn. Our State is a splendid agricultural and grazing region. So we have an abundance of stock, and our people are living well. We have a great deal of property. That has nothing to do—

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator from Kansas one other question?

question?

question?
Mr. PEFFER. Yes.
Mr. HOAR. Has not a large part of that prosperity, rather the largest part, come to Kansas since the year 1873?
Mr. PEFFER. I think so.
Mr. HOAR. Now, I should like to put one other question. Is it not on the whole the part of good statesmanship to keep on with the policy which has produced these results of prosperity and wealth and comfort, and schoolhouses and churches, and railroads by the ten thousand miles, rather than to depart from it and try a new one?

Mr. PEFFER. Some of the things connected with that progress have been most deleterious. I have stood by and seen men and women sign notes and mortgages agreeing to pay as high as 40 per cent interest on borrowed money. That is a destructive policy, I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts. During the decade from 1880 to 1890 Kansas people borrowed over $500,000,000, and the average rate of interest that it cost the borrowers was at least 10 per cent. If the Senator wishes me to include that policy in the system of progress to which he refers, I then say we do not want any more of it; for it is that which, with all of our thrift and all of our energy, has brought about the political revolution in Kansas. These mortgage hunters, these loan agents, no matter in Kansas. These mortgage hunters, these loan agents, no matter where they came from, no matter whose agents they were, have done Kansas and Nebraska and all that great region of country more harm than all of the visitations of Providence which have ever befallen us.

Mr. President, Kansas people have become more noted perhaps than some of our neighbors because of our energy, because of our peculiar characteristic of going ahead and taking care of ourselves, and of being good to our neighbors at the same time. You will remember that when the Atchison, Topeka and Sante Fe Railroad Company began their work (the Union Pacific as well, but more especially the Sante Fe) they sent their advertising matter like especially the Sante Fe) they sent their advertising matter like leaves of the forest, scattering it over the habitable globe, and sent their agents to every civilized nation, proclaiming the richness of our soil, the delightfulness of our climate, the salubrity of our atmosphere, the energy of our people, and the vastness of the empire that was round about us. So from the very beginning of our history Kansas people have always been in the front, advertising ourselves and building up our Commonwealth.

To-day we are still in debt; and it is largely because of the oppressive burden of these debts that a political revolution has come about in the State. Our people are as honest to-day as they ever about in the State. Our people are as honest to-day as they ever about in the State. Our people are as nonest to-day as they ever were; our lands are as good as they ever were; our sunshine as shimmering and our climate as salubrious as it ever was, and our people are as enterprising as they ever were. From year to year, through this sad, hard experience, we are learning wisdom, and we will come out in the end master of the situation. We have not up to this hour asked the Government for a penny. Two years ago, when a bill was brought before the Senate asking for relief to ago, when a bill was brought before the Senate asking for relief to settlers in some of the other States on account of losses occasioned by drought, while I voted for the bill and urged its passage, I took occasion to say at the time that the people of Kansas were suffering in like manner, but that we were able to help ourselves, and we did not propose to ask the Government for help.

The rights which Indians have in these reservations are possessive rights. That was determined loss ago. The shiest in sessory rights. That was determined long ago. The object in purchasing them from the Indians is to procure homes for our people. I need not recall to the attention of the Senate the scrampeople. I need not recall to the attention of the Senate the scramble and the rushing, the tumbling and the racing, the anxiety of the people who were anxious to get across the line in order that they might secure homes on Indian lands just opened to white settlement. While it is true that the town builders were there, and the speculators, yet the great body of the people who engaged in that dreadful race was composed of men and women who were in search of homes for themselves and their families. It has come to a time in this country, Mr. President, when homes are in demand, and the object of the homestead law was to procure homes for the people.

homes for the people.

There are two reasons, Mr. President, why the pending bill is proper. One of them is that in a large measure in the region of western Nebraska, western Kansas, western Indian Territory, and Texas the lands are not well adapted to the ordinary processes of agriculture common among the people from the Eastern States, who move upon those lands to cultivate them. It required a long time in Kansas for our farmers in the western portion of the State to adapt themselves to the climatic conditions, to the peculiarities of the soil. The traveler in passing over that region will observe as he goes from the eastern part of the State away beyond that the native prairie grass is from 2 to 6 feet high, and I have seen it as high as 11 feet in the low grounds, for horses and men riding would be lost in the prairie grass, because the tops were above the would be lost in the prairie grass, because the tops were above the men's heads. Go to the western part of the State, and you will find the grass growing from 4 to 6 inches in height, a fine, peculiarly colored grass, known as buffalo in that region. Not only is the climate different, not only is the rainfall less, but the soil conditions themselves are different. Different crops necessarily are adapted to the different regions. All these things have to be

Most of the settlers in Oklahoma have discovered that the climatic and soil conditions there are not favorable to the methods of cultivation to which they have been accustomed. Those people are not yet able to master the natural difficulties that are in the way, but doubtless they will be in time, if they are permitted to remain where they are.

In addition to that, modern methods of agriculture have operated to reduce the profits upon labor the same as modern methods of manufacture have reduced the profits of manufacturing, and this adds to the troubles of the Oklahoma people.

There is one further idea I wish to impress upon the Senate.

Men and nations have certain rights within and of themselves, but their rights do not extend beyond those that naturally belong but their rights do not extend beyond those that naturally belong to their individuality, either as persons or as nations or communities. For example, the head of one family has no natural or moral right, no legal right, to interfere with the management, the home discipline, or any of the affairs of another family so long as they are not violating the orderly laws of society. So it is with nations. Nations have no right to govern people at arm's length. On that theory alone I favor the independence of Cuba. We see Spain, a monarchy 3,000 miles away, in the closing years of the nineteenth century, governing by the harsh rule of the sword another people. The thing in itself is preposterous. The civilization of the age has gone beyond that kind of government.

The power of Britain is felt in every part of the civilized world. The footprints of the Englishman are everywhere, but every

The footprints of the Englishman are everywhere, but every dependency of Great Britain has local autonomy, and so much attached are the people there to the Government of their mother country and to the habits of the people in England that they are now talking about forming an empire which will be world-wide, now taking about forming an empire which will be world-wide, advancing and establishing the imperialism of the English people. But here in Cuba we have an armed revolution against the foreign power recurring every few years.

So upon general principles, the principles of natural right, I would argue in favor of the independence of Cuba, and, if I were not a Senator of the United States, I would go so far as to say that I believed it to be the duty of the Government of the United States to say to the Government of Spain: "We want this war stopped; we want Cuba to be free, no matter what it costs here or alsowhere"

So it is, Mr. President, as to the rights of individuals. I said a moment ago that I believe men have rights. The boys who are sitting in front of me here have the same rights exactly that you and I have, Mr. President, and that these venerable Senators around me have. When a child is born into the world, he comes with the same rights that the mother who bore him had and that his father before him had. They have no right to banish him when he comes to what we in law call the age of majority, 21 years and past—the father has no right to banish him from the home where he was born. I believe the Government ought to establish as a permanent policy that whenever it purchases a foot of land from Indians or from any other person or corporation it should be purchased for the use of the people as homes. Mr. President, the people of this country have a right to live here, they and the children who are coming after them. I hope the bill will pass upon its merits. So it is, Mr. President, as to the rights of individuals. I said a children who are coming after them. I hope the bill will pass upon its merits.

I am pleased to see that the opposition which has been thus far manifested against the bill is farfetched and upon technical grounds. Two of the Senators who have argued in opposition to it say they may possibly be considered old fogies, as men behind the age. Those Senators need not be sensitive upon that point. There is such a thing, however, as progress. The world is moving. The old States-rights Democrat is one of the things of the past. He has come to understand as all the rest of us do understand. He has come to understand, as all the rest of us do understand, that the sphere of the State government is purely local and for local purposes; that we have neither time nor inclination to take a surveyor with us when we travel across the country at the rate of 50 or 60 miles an hour to mark the location of State lines, that we may know under what different laws we are as we pass through the different jurisdictions. The people of the United States constitute a nation, and now we are big enough to take care of ourselves and to take care of those of our people who are unfortunate and who need relief at our hands.

Mr. HOAR. I will not object to that unanimous consent if the Senator will further ask unanimous consent that some time to-morrow be assigned for taking the vote. I think the Senate

Mr. PETTIGREW. I am perfectly willing to embrace in my request the further request that the vote be taken at 4 o'clock

Mr. ALLEN. I suppose there are Senators who are not now here who ought to be advised when the vote is to be taken; and I suggest that the day after to-morrow be fixed as the time.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think we had better leave that question

mr. PETTIGREW. I think we had better leave that question until to-morrow.

Mr. HOAR. I shall object unless the proposition be included that the vote be taken to-morrow; but if the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Allen] prefers the latter time, I will not object to that.

Mr. ALLEN. I was going to suggest that if we take the vote to-morrow, as there are but few Senators now present who would be retained to the order it would be retained to the senators of the order.

Mr. HOAR. I will consent to an arrangement being made that the vote be taken the day after to-morrow.

Mr. ALLEN. Perhaps the Senator from South Dakota will be willing to-morrow to ask that a time be fixed when the vote shall be taken. Mr. HOAR. I think the Senate is ready to fix an hour, but if the Senator from Nebraska thinks that the fixing of the hour to-morrow may disappoint some Senators who would like to be here, I shall not object if the next day be fixed as the time when the vote shall be taken, but I shall object to any unanimous consent unless it is accompanied with a proposal of some time for taking the final vote. Of course, if the Senate is ready to vote before then, it can be done.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to make an inquiry. I am told the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Bacon] gave notice that he desired to address the Senate to-morrow in regard to some resolution now pending before the body. Is that the case?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; on the resolution in relation to the recognition of Cuba.

Mr. PETTIGREW. If that is the case, I should prefer to make the request for a vote to-morrow, and to see what we accomplish to-morrow. I do not know that we can accomplish anything, for when a Cuban debate arises here it takes up all the time of the Senate; and therefore I renew my request.

Mr. HOAR. I shall object.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Very well, then, the bill can go over as the unfinished business for to-morrow.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator can get the bill up to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota requests that the pending bill be taken up as the unfinished business immediately after the routine business in the morning hour o-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. FRYE. I understood that the Senator withdrew that re-

Mr. PETTIGREW. No; I did not withdraw that request. The Senator from Massachusetts has objected to it, as I understand. Mr. FRYE. Then that ends the request.
Mr. HOAR. It is obvious, for the reason the Senator has stated, if he is correctly informed, as unquestionably he is, that a Senator proposes to take the floor to-morrow after the routine morning business to speak on Cuba, that unanimous consent will be of no value to the Senator from South Dakota, because his bill will be laid aside for that speech. So I object.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Georgia gave notice that he would ask leave of the Senate to address the Senate to-morrow

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think that there can be no harm in granting the request, because if the Senator from Georgia should conclude his speech in the morning hour we can then take up the pending bill, and hasten with it.

Mr. HOAR. We can take it up as it is.
Mr. CALL. I propose to move, if there be no objection, that Mr. FRYE. There are some papers on the table of the President which I should like to have laid before the Senate before adjournment, if the Senator will withdraw his motion.

Mr. CALL. Very well.

MARKING OF VESSELS' NAMES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1424) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend section 4178, Revised Statutes, in relation to the marking of vessels' names at bow and stern, and also to provide for marking the draft," approved February 21, 1891, which was, on page 2, line 24, to strike out the word "six" and insert "seven."

ment, which is rendered necessary by the fact that this bill passed the Senate a year ago, and provided that the marking should be done during the year 1896, but the bill having just been passed by the other House, of course "1897" has to be substituted for

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was concurred in.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CALL. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] desires to move an executive session, and I will yield to him for that purpose. Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After sixteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 13, 1897, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 12, 1897.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a change of reference. At the last session of Congress we passed what was known as the Quackenbush bill; for the relief of John N. Quackenbush. It passed both Houses, but failed to get the approval of the President. It has again passed the Senate and reached this House yesterday, being referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. The Judiciary Committee has passed upon the bill again, and it is on the Calendar as reported from our committee. By some mistake it was referred yesterday to the Committee on Naval Affairs. I move that the Committee on Naval Affairs be discharged from its further consideration and that it he referred to the Committee its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee

The SPEAKER. That is a question for the House to determine. As many as are in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Henderson] will say "aye."

The motion was agreed to.

PACIFIC RAILROAD FUNDING BILL.

The SPEAKER. On the question of the Pacific Railroad funding bill, the Chair thinks that the motion made yesterday by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Powers] to recommit the bill was not in order. The Chair thinks that such a motion could have been made if the House had passed the bill to a third reading or in other was a such a motion could have been made if the House had passed the bill to a third reading or in other was a such as the such as t ing, or if other business had not intervened.

OFFICERS AND CREW OF THE BRIG GENERAL ARMSTRONG.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to call the attention of the House to the bill (S. 687) to apply the unexpended balance of the amount heretofore appropriated for the relief of the captain, owners, officers, and crew of the late United States private armed brig General Armstrong, their heirs, executors, administrators, agents, or assigns. On the face of it, it seems to relate to a war claim, and did remotely so relate; but the Chair is informed that the question involved is a legal question, as to the meaning of a resolution passed by a previous Congress. Therefore the Chair asks unanimous consent that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Is there objection? on the Judiciary. Is there There was no objection. Is there objection?

R. M. RIDGELY.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the following communication from the office of the Postmaster-General.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL, Washington, D. C., January 11, 1897.

Washington, D. C., January 11, 1897, SIR: I beg leave to call your attention to my letter of December 11, 1896, in which I requested the return to this Department of certain papers in the case of the claim of R. M. Ridgely, postmaster at Springfield, Ill., which were transmitted by me on the 3d of April, 1896, to the Speaker of the House, in compliance with the act of May 9, 1888. Congress, by act approved June 11, 1896, having extended the limit in such claims of the jurisdiction of the Postmaster-General, I desire to take up this case for decision under the authority of that act. Will you kindly direct that these papers be returned to the Department? ment? Very respectfully,

W. L. WILSON, Postmaster-General.

Hon. Thomas B. Reed,

Speaker House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Chair will direct the papers to be returned. The Chair hears no objection.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. There being no other business on the Speaker's table except one matter which the Chair will submit later, the Clerk will resume the call of committees.

ALJEN OWNERSHIP OF LANDS IN THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. CATRON. Mr. Speaker, there was a matter pending last night.

The SPEAKER. There was an unfinished matter before the House from the Committee on Territories, and the question was on the passage of the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

A bill (H. R. 8615) to amend an act entitled "An act to restrict the owner-ship of real estate in the Territories to American citizens, etc.," approved March 3, 1887.

The question was taken. Mr. McEWAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question, for infor-

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McEWAN. Is not that the same bill that was defeated in the House the 10th day of December?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know.
Mr. McEWAN (continuing). Except as to one section. Yes;

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Division!

The House divided; and there were—ayes, 59; noes 26.

So the bill was passed.
On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON (at the request of Mr. CATRON), a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Platt, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution (S. R. 189) providing for the erection of a Government building at the Tenessee Centennial Exposition; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1726) to approve and ratify the construction of a bridge across the Red River, between the States of Arkansas and Texas, at a point above the town of Fulton, in Arkansas, on said river, built by the Texarkana Northern Railway Company, but now owned and operated by the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company, and to authorize the latter company to maintain said bridge over said waterway, subject to certain stipulations and conditions.

PROCEDURE IN CONTESTS BETWEEN CLAIMANTS TO MINERAL LAND AND AGRICULTURAL LAND.

Mr. HARTMAN (when the Committee on Mines and Mining was called). Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 6780) to amend section 2335 of the Revised Statutes. The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2335 of the Revised Statutes be amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 2335. All affidavits required to be made under this chapter may be verified before any officer authorized to administer oaths in any State or Territory in the United States or in the District of Columbia having an official seal; and all testimony and proofs may be taken before any such officer, and when duly certified by the officer taking the same, attested by his seal of office, shall have the same force and effect as if taken before the register and receiver of the land office. In cases of contest as to the mineral or agricultural character of land the testimony and proofs may be taken under such notice and regulations as the Commissioner of the General Land office may prescribe: Provided, That the presence of rock in place or of deposits bearing gold, silver, cinnabar, or other valuable mineral, shall be regarded as prima facie evidence that the land containing the character of land, with a view to ascertaining whether it is more valuable for mineral than agricultural purposes, evidence may be taken of the mineral discovered or developed adjacent to such land, proof of which shall be corroborative evidence that the land in question is mineral in character: And provided further, That wherever land is proven to be within a well-defined mineral belt it shall be deemed prima facie evidence of the mineral character of said land."

Mr. DOCKERY. Is that bill on the House Calendar?

Mr. DOCKERY. Is that bill on the House Calendar? The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that it is on the House Calendar.

Mr. DOCKERY. It aims indirectly to provide for the dispo-

Mr. DOCKERY. It aims indirectly to provide for the disposition of public lands.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Itought not to be on the House Calendar.

Mr. DOCKERY. It seems to be a very important bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I make the point of order that it ought not to be on the House Calendar.

Mr. HARTMAN. Now—

The SPEAKER. What is the purport of the bill?

Mr. HARTMAN. The purport of the bill is to permit applicants for mineral lands to make their evidence before other officers than registers and receivers of the United States land office, and thereby to prevent the long travel which is necessary in order to appear before those officers; and there is one other phase of the to appear before those officers; and there is one other phase of the

Mr. DOCKERY. But it does more than that. Mr. HARTMAN. I was about to say there was

I was about to say there was one other phase, but I can not say it all in one sentence.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, before this discussion proceeds, the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands desires to raise the question of jurisdiction.

Mr. LACEY. I do not know that I desire to raise the question

Mr. LACEY. I do not know that I desire to raise the question of jurisdiction.

The SPEAKER. All points are reserved.

Mr. LACEY. I reserve the point of order until I can hear further what is the nature of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is already made.

Mr. HARTMAN. The second purpose of the legislation is to establish a rule of procedure in contests between claimants to mineral and agricultural lands. The bill was introduced by the gentleman from Utah [Mr. ALLEN], and is favorably and unanimously reported by the Committee on Mines and Mining. If further explanation of the bill is desired, I will yield to the gentleman from Utah, who is entirely familiar with it.

Mr. LACEY. What I desire to ascertain is, why this bill was not sent to the proper committee having charge of matters of this kind. I do not see what jurisdiction the Committee on Mines and Mining would have as to the disposition of lands that are mineral in their character. It would lead to endless confusion if there should be legislation proposed from two committees on the same subject.

Mr. HARTMAN.

Mr. HARTMAN. Unquestionably the Committee on Mines and Mining has jurisdiction of legislation in respect to the business of mines and mining.

Mr. LACEY. Certainly; but not as to the question of public lands

The SPEAKER. The rules prescribe that if by any error or misunderstanding a bill has been sent to the wrong committee, it is the duty of the committee who desire jurisdiction to present the matter to the House for a change; and no question having been raised, and the committee having reported, the Chair thinks it is too late to raise the question of consideration. On the other point—of its being on the House Calendar—the Chair hardly knows where of its being on the House Calendar—the Chair hardly knows where it could be but on that Calendar.

Mr. DOCKERY. The ruling of the Speaker of the last House was that you could raise the question of jurisdiction at this point. But perhaps the rule of that House is different in this respect.

The SPEAKER. The rules differ in some respects.

Mr. LACEY. At any rate, inasmuch as the Committee on Public Lands has been examining these questions and are responsible for this class of legislation, and inasmuch as that committee had no knowledge of the existence of this bill, I would at least like to hear a full statement of the merits of the bill.

Mr. HARTMAN. In that case I will yield to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. ALLEN], the author of the bill, who will explain from Utah [Mr. ALLEN], the author of the bill, who will explain it fully.

The SPEAKER. Of course the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Lacey] can, if he desires, move at the proper time to refer the bill to the Committee on Public Lands, and if the House sees fit to do that, the mistake can be rectified, if a mistake has been made.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Mr. Speaker, this bill was introduced in the Fifty-third Congress, and was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining. That committee reported it favorably to the House, and when it was reintroduced in the present Congress it went to the same committee that had passed upon it in the Fifty-third Congress, and it seems to me that the Committee on Mines and Mining clearly has jurisdiction of the questions involved. This is not, in the broad sense, a bill coming within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Public Lands, of which committee I also am a member. There are but two points in the bill which would am a member. There are but two points in the bill which would change existing law. One is in relation to the making of affidavits, the law now requiring that they be made before the register and receiver of the land office of the district within which the claim is located.

Now, many of these land districts are very large. The State of Utah constitutes but one, and there are 84,000 square miles in that State; so that, under the present law, extensive travel is required, and in many instances great expense is incurred in order to make the necessary affidavits for the entry of claims, and the committee are quite satisfied that no harm can come to anybody from the change proposed in this bill, allowing those who have the right, under the State law, to administer oaths, to take these affidavits and attest them with their seals.

Mr. DOCKERY. Has this bill been submitted to the Commissioner of the General Land Office or to the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. This same bill was submitted to the Department in the Fifty-third Congress and a favorable report Department in the Fifty-third Congress and a favorable report upon it was made to the committee.

Mr. DOCKERY. Do I understand that the Commissioner reported favorably upon the bill, in writing?

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Yes, sir. The committee's report shows that. The second point in the bill which would change existing law is intended to fix the burden of proof, in the case of an entry of mineral lands situated within or adjacent to a mineral-bearing zone, which is contested by an agricultural claimant, upon the agricultural claimant, where it should be. These are the only two points involved, and it seems to me that the bill ought to pass, because it will afford relief in many instances. because it will afford relief in many instances.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to commit this bill to the Committee on Public Lands, and upon that motion I desire to make just a few remarks. The gentleman who introduced this bill is a member of the Committee on Public Lands, so that no injury can come to the bill from its being referred to that committee, which is the proper committee. It is utterly impossible for the members of that committee to give the bill proper consideration at this time, owing to the hasty manner in which it is brought up in the House. Were the questions involved of minor importance I should not feel inclined to make this motion, but the bill is really a very important one, involving the whole subject of the disposition of mineral lands and a change of the methods of proof in such cases. Evidently it ought to be considered by the proper committee and ought to be referred to the Department for information. I believe that no delay will result from referring the bill to the Committee on Public Lands, and it certainly ought the bill to the Committee on Public Lands, and it certainly ought to go there.

Mr. HARTMAN. Does the gentleman really consider that this bill makes an entire change in the method of obtaining titles to mineral lands, when in fact all that it does is this: It says to the applicant for a mineral land patent, "You may appear before the clerk of the court in your own town, or before a notary public in your own town, and make your affidavit there, instead of getting on the train, traveling two or three or four hundred miles, and making the same affidavit before the register of the land office?"

Mr. LACEY. That is merely a change of procedure.

Mr. HARTMAN. And the gentleman really thinks that is so important a question that the Committee on Mines and Mining is not capable of dealing with it?

Mr. LACEY. No. If that was all there was in the bill I would not make the point; but there is more than that. There are questions involved as to the burden of proof, and as to the presumption arising from the location of rock as affecting the mineral character arising from the location of rock as affecting the mineral character of the land, and other questions. This bill was introduced only on the 19th of December last. I do not see any occasion for such a hasty disposal of it, and I insist that it ought to be referred to on the 18th of December 18st. I do not see any occasion for such a hasty disposal of it, and I insist that it ought to be referred to the proper committee.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Iowa is under an entire misapprehension as to this bill. In the first place, it was not introduced hastily.

Mr. LACEY. I did not say hastily. I said lately.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Nor lately.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Nor lately.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. It was introduced at the first session of this Congress by me. It was introduced by the gentleman from California, Mr. Caminetti, in the Fifty-third Congress, and was then referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining. That committee took jurisdiction and returned it to the House with a favorable report, that report being practically the same as the one now presented. The bill was referred to the Interior Department during the Fifty-third Congress and was favorably reported upon by that Department. On the 19th of December, 1896, the committee reported the bill to the House, and the report contains what the officers of the Department had said concerning the two points in the bill that would change existing law, and I remind the gentleman that the Land Office has now the same head that it had when this bill that the Land Office has now the same head that it had when this bill was favorably recommended by the Department during the Fiftythird Congress. Therefore, I can not see that anything will be gained by referring the bill at this time to the Committee on Public Lands, even though it might have gone there in the first place; though I have my doubts as to the jurisdiction of that committee in this case

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. Lacey to refer the bill to the Committee on the Public Lands, the Speaker declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. LACEY. I ask for a division. The House divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 43.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 43.

So the motion was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. LACEY. I object to laying the motion to reconsider on the table. I would be glad to have the motion lie over until further time has been given for the examination of the bill. I ask unanimous consent that the motion to reconsider lie over until to-moreover morning.

row morning.
Mr. HARTMAN. I think we had better have the question settled at this time.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

The question being taken upon laying on the table the motion to reconsider, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 53, noes 7.

PREFERENCES IN THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. BROSIUS (when the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service was called). I call up from the House Calendar the bill which I send to the desk.

The bill (H. R. 5635) to amend section 1754 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to preferences in the civil service was read as follows:

incurred in the line of duty; second, to all honorably discharged Union soldiers and sailors of the war of the rebellion and the widows of such honorably discharged persons: Provided, That they are found to possess the business capacity for the proper discharge of the duties of such offices."

Mr. BROSIUS. I ask that the report of the committee be read in my time.

The report (by Mr. VAN VOORHIS) was read, as follows:

The report (by Mr. Van Voorhis) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Reform in the Civil'Service, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5635) to amend section 1734 of Revised Statutes of the United States, report the same back to the House with a recommendation that it do pass, amended by inserting the word "necessary" after the word "capacity," in the last line of the bill.

Under existing law the class to which preference is given in appointments is extremely limited, so much so that in the year 1894 there were but 14 of that class placed upon the eligible list for the entire classified service of the United States, and only 10 secured appointments. In the year 1893, 15 were placed on the eligible list and 13 received appointments. From June 30, 1894, to January 1, 1896, only 4 were appointed in the departmental service.

After the lapse of thirty years from the close of the late war, and in view of the widely prevailing sense of gratitude and generosity toward the surviving defenders of the Union, it is believed that the extension of the preference, not to interfere with the surviving remnant who now enjoy the preference, but as a second preferred class, to all honorably discharged soldiers and sailors of the late war would be an act of justice which the people of the United States, in grateful recognition of the services and sacrifices of those who served in the Army and Navy in the war for the Union, will highly commend.

It is believed that the average age of those passing examinations is about 30 years, while the average age of those passing examinations is about 30 years, while the average age of those passing examinations is about 30 years, while the average age of those passing examinations is about 30 years, while the average age of those passing examinations of about 37 years. It is therefore apparent that the number of this class who will pass the merit test under our civil-service rules will be very limited.

The extension of a preference to the widows of soldiers and sailors who were honorably

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Speaker, if there are no inquiries to be made about this measure, I will ask the previous question.
Mr. RICHARDSON. I should like to have some explanation of the bill. It was almost impossible for us to gather the full tenor of it from the reading.

Mr. BROSIUS. I asked to have the report read because it states clearly the object of the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It was impossible for us to understand it.

Mr. BROSIUS. Very well. Then I will endeavor to make the matter clear by an explanation.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Will the gentleman yield a moment? I should like to have the bill read again. I think that no member in this neighborhood understood the reading.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the bill will be again read.

The bill was again read.

Mr. BROSIUS. Now, Mr. Chairman, if there are no inquiries,
I will ask the previous question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I hope the gentleman will first make the explanation which he offered to make.

Mr. BROSIUS. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I wish to call the gentleman's attention rectionlarly to the language of the proviso:

particularly to the language of the proviso:

Provided, That they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such offices.

for the proper discharge of the duties of such offices.

That proviso seems to limit the qualifications to simple business capacity, saying nothing about intellectual or other qualifications.

A MEMBER. Or moral qualifications.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I should like to hear the gentleman's explanation of the bill.

Mr. BROSIUS. It is understood by all that a limited number of the soldiers of the late war enjoy a preference under the existing civil-service law and rules. The number is very limited, because it only refers to those who have been discharged from the service by reason of wounds or sickness contracted in the service. As the report states, the number of those who have enjoyed the privilege of that preference by admission to the civil service has been extremely limited. This bill does not propose to abolish the privilege of that class in any way; they will remain in the same position in reference to the service; but it proposes to extend the privilege to the remaining honorably discharged soldiers of the late war, giving these a second preference.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman unnecessarily, but I should like to call his attention to one matter.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman unnecessarily, but I should like to call his attention to one matter. Mr. BROSIUS. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The language of the existing law, section 1754, which this bill is designed to amend, reads:

Persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability, etc.

Now, I notice that the proposed amendment varies this language so that the provision of the section will apply—

First, to persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service of the United States by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in the line of duty; second, to all honorably discharged Union soldiers and sailors, etc.

Now, I observe that in this second provision different language is used from that embraced in the first clause; and the question in my mind is whether the language "all honorably discharged Union soldiers and sailors" might not apply to others than regular

Mr. BROSIUS. Oh, no; I do not think there is any possibility

Mr. RICHARDSON. Might it not apply in some cases to persons who were in the militia? They might be designated "Union soldiers," but I imagine the gentleman would not want to extend the provision of the bill so far.

Mr. BROSIUS. I am not sure that I recall the reasons for the distinction embraced in the language used. But I want to direct my friend's attention to the language of the existing law:

Persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service

Mr. RICHARDSON. That language is not objectionable. Mr. BROSIUS. I know it is not objectionable to my friend; of Mr. BROSIUS. I know it is not objectionable to my friend; of course, it is not.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then why not retain it?

Mr. BROSIUS. Because, literally taken, it might include the Confederate service as well as the Union service. There is nothing in that language which makes any discrimination as to the side on which or the service in which the soldier served. I do not remember distinctly the reason for that change of language, but I see every reason, as far as I understand the objection of the gentleman from Tennessee, for retaining that language in the bill.

But, in order to make entirely clear the language as used in the bill, "discharged Union soldiers and sailors of the war of the rebellion," it seems to me that the express terms used should be retained, for it leaves it beyond all doubt and makes perfectly clear the intention of Congress in the matter. Certainly it can

Mr. RICHARDSON. Undoubtedly; but if the gentleman will allow me a moment—

Mr. BROSIUS. Certainly.
Mr. RICHARDSON. In the first place, it says in the first

Persons honorably discharged from the miltary or naval service by reason of disability—

And so on.

Mr. BROSIUS. Because that is the language of the existing law law.

Mr. RICHARDSON. No, sir; the gentleman is mistaken. It is not the language of the existing law; and if the gentleman will adopt that language it will remove all of the objections.

But, secondly, this bill applies to all "honorably discharged Union soldiers and sailors of the war of the rebellion." Now, in the first place, let me state to the gentleman that I do not object to the insertion of the words "United States" in the first provision, because although that is not in the language of the original sion, because, although that is not in the language of the original act, it was so understood and has always been so applied, although these words do not appear in the section the gentleman proposes to amend.

The gentleman in the first clause of this bill limits the provision of this act to soldiers and sailors of the United States; then in the second clause he says to "all honorably discharged Union soldiers and sailors." Why not use the same terms in the second clause and sailors." Why not use the same terms in the second clause that are used in the first, namely, that is all "honorably discharged soldiers and sailors of the United States?" Why make such a change?

Mr. BROSIUS. I do not know of any cogent reason why one Mr. BROSIUS. I do not know of any cogent reason why one should have been used more than the other, or why the words should have been changed in drawing the bill. But inasmuch as they are already in the bill, unless my friend can show that they are ambiguous, and are likely to result in harm, I do not see where the objection comes in.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Why, the objection is that this might include militia as well as the discharged officers and soldiers of the Regular Army of the United States.

Mr. BROSIUS. I have no objection whatever to the change that the gentleman suggests by inserting the words "United States."

But let me call the attention of the gentleman to another possible reason for using different language in the two sections. It is a part of the existing law in making any reduction of the force in any of the Executive Departments of the Government the head of such Department shall retain those persons who may be equally qualified and have been "honorably discharged from the military or naval service of the United States." My friend will mark the words: "And the widows and orphans of deceased soldiers and sailors." sailors."

Now, the preference that the bill contemplates over and above the existing preferences is just this: To give them, when they apply for admission to the service, the precise privilege which they already enjoy under the law after they are within the service; and that is the purpose of the bill, to make it uniform.

Now, in order to make it not only identical in sentiment, but in language as well, I am quite willing to amend by striking out the word "Union" and inserting the words "United States," in order to keep it not only in harmony with existing purposes, but in har-mony with phraseology of the existing law. Is my friend content with that?

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is all I have sought. Mr. DOCKERY. Then the section would read as amended:

Second, to persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service of the United States, and the widows of such honorably discharged persons.

Mr. BROSIUS. That would be the modification.
Mr. DOCKERY. That, I understand, would meet the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee?
Mr. BROSIUS. Yes.

Mr. BROSIUS. Yes.
Mr. RICHARDSON. Does the gentleman offer that amendment, or does he wish me to offer it?
Mr. BROSIUS. The gentleman can offer it, and I will not

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move to amend, then, in section 1, so that the paragraph will read, "first, to persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service of the United States in the war of the rebellion."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 18, amend the paragraph so as to read:
"Second, to all honorably discharged soldiers and sailors of the United States of the war of the rebellion, and the widows of such honorably discharged persons."

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would suggest that the language would be a little better if the gentleman would use the exact language embodied in the first clause—that is, "persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service of the United States," and the widows of such honorably discharged persons.

Mr. BROSIUS. I understand that would be the amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will offer that amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will offer that amendment.

Mr. BROSIUS. It occurred to me, and perhaps it occurred to the gentleman who drew the bill, that this would include not only soldiers of the late war, but all soldiers of the United States. That is a possible reason for drawing it in this manner. It would include soldiers of the Regular Army as well as those of the late war of the rebellion, which was not the purpose of the bill. If my friend will include in his amendment soldiers and sailors of the United States in the late war of the rebellion, that will be satis-

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee had perhaps better reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is right.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker—
The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?
Mr. RICHARDSON. I think it would be better to get the amendment adopted.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 17, strike out all after the word "second." Strike out all of lines 13 and 19, and insert "all persons honorably discharged from the military and naval service of the United States in the war of the rebellion, and the widows of such honorably discharged persons."

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to the proviso in line 20, and ask him if he does not think that the proper grammatical construction of that proviso would make it apply alone to the second law and not to the first? I think he meant that it should apply to both, and it seems to me that it ought to be made to apply to both classes. In other words, I think it should read:

Provided. That they are found in each case to possess the business capacity ecessary for the proper discharge of their duties.

That will make the proviso perfectly plain.

Mr. BROSIUS. I think that the language of the bill is not subject to the objection made. I think grammatically the proviso refers to both classes named. I think that was put in the bill in order to keep it in harmony with existing law. Section 1754 of the Revised Statutes contains the same proviso:

Provided, They are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such offices.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact, however, that there is but one class referred to in the law which he has just read.

Mr. BROSIUS. I know.

Mr. RICHARDSON. While in the law, as he now offers it, there are two classes. Therefore the proviso ought to apply to

Mr. BROSIUS. I understand my friend's point, but I do not think it is well taken, because the proviso refers, I think, gram-matically to both classes, and it does not require a discriminating word to make it cover both classes. I think there is no possibility of misconstruing the language of the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Still, then, the gentleman would not object to having it made so in so many words.

Mr. BROSIUS. I do not see any objection, except the objection that always lies to introducing needless and useless verbiage into a bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Imove that the bill be amended by inserting after the word "that," in line 20, the words "as to both

Mr. DOCKERY. As to both classes. Mr. BROSIUS, I do not object to that. The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

On page 2, line 20, after the word "that," insert the words "as to both classes."

Mr. BROSIUS. I have no objection whatever to that.

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker—
The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROSIUS] yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON]?
Mr. BROSIUS. I have not yet yielded.
Mr. JOHNSON of California. Is it in order, Mr. Speaker, to rise to a question of personal privilege now?
The SPEAKER. Not unless it has connection with this case.
Mr. JOHNSON of California. Then I must wait until this bill is disposed of?

disposed of?

is disposed of?

Mr. BROSIUS. It will be disposed of in a minute.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Then I shall ask the floor at that time upon a question of personal privilege.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROSIUS] a question.

Mr. BROSIUS. Certainly.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I believe you are an advocate of the merit system and the enforcement of the civil-service rules. Does not system and the enforcement of the civil-service rules. Does not this set aside the merit system and the competitive examination theory on which it is based entirely?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Only partially.

Mr. BROSIUS. Well, in the matter of sentiment there is an order of precedence as well as in other matters, and the people of order of precedence as well as in other matters, and the people of the United States have always been willing to relax the merit principle sufficiently to give a preference to those who saved the country. That is all I care to say in response to that question.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to know from the gentleman if he can give us any information as to how far this sentiment is to be applied. Does this set aside the list of those who have passed the civil-service examinations from civil life, and give the preference, regardless of their merits, to those who have served in the military and naval service, and for which service they have always received compensation? If that is sufficient to get them on the eligible list, then I think it is a great and gross injustice to the young men and young women of the country who are trying to prepare themselves for the civil service of the Government. Will the gentleman answer that question?

Mr. BROSIUS. I will be glad to answer that question in the best way I can when the case arises; but I shall now ask the pre-best way I can when the case arises; but I shall now ask the prewious question.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BROSIUS. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY. I should like to ask the gentleman whether, under this beautiful civil-service system as now developed, if he knows of any Union soldier who votes the Republican ticket who has ever been found of sufficient business capacity to enter the civil service under this Administration? Can you name one Republican soldier who has been given a preference during the past three years?

past three years?

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Speaker, if I were to answer that question I would show that I had been making inquiry into the politics of those who have applied for admission to the civil service in the country—a thing that is forbidden by the law and the spirit of the merit system [laughter]—and therefore I am unable to say, in reply to my friend, whether any soldiers who have gone into the civil service have been Republicans or Democrats.

Mr. HARDY. As the gentleman is such a close student of civil—

Mr. HARDY. As the gentleman is such a close student of civil-service reform, I supposed he had investigated the question in all its details and knew all about it. You evidently do not know anything about civil service as practiced by this Administration.

[Laughter.]
Mr. WASHINGTON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him

a question?

Mr. BROSIUS. Of course anything relating to politics in the civil service, which is the essence of the spoils system, is something with which a real advocate of the merit system in the civil service of the country is not supposed to be conversant. I now ask for the previous question.

Mr. WASHINGTON. And now will you allow me to ask you one question?

Mr. BROSIUS. Why, with pleasure.

Mr. WASHINGTON. In that same line? You decline to inquire into the politics of any applicant for this civil-service examination, and say that the merit system eliminates all questions of politics; but the gentleman nevertheless insists on an additional sentiment other than politics, which shall be recognized in appointments to positions in the civil service, regardless

Mr. BROSIUS. Well, now, I will let my friend have the benefit of the last remark; and will demand the previous question on

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. I would like to inquire if there is any opportunity to offer an amendment to this bill?

The SPEAKER. Not unless the House votes down the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BROSIUS. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio for a question.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, in order that I may understand the operations of this bill, if it should become a law, I want to ask two or three questions, seriously.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is right; go ahead.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. First, I desire the gentleman from Pennsylvania to state whether these soldiers are required to take the examinations necessary for entering the civil service?

Mr. BROSIUS. My friend will excuse me; my attention was diverted and I did not catch the beginning of his question.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. My question is, whether these soldiers who are to have the preference are required to take the civil-service

Mr. BROSIUS. Oh, yes.
Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Then how do they get a preference after the examination has taken place and they have passed the civil-the examination has taken place and may have place service examination?

Mr. BROSIUS. They get the advantage they now have in the percentage. The soldier in the limited class under the existing law who gets an average percentage of 65 goes upon the eligible list; and the soldiers included in the present bill would have the same advantage. Seventy is the lowest average that will place an applicant upon the eligible list—that is, the ordinary applicant. But in the limited class, soldiers who enjoy the preference under But in the limited class, soldiers who enjoy the preference under the existing law will be placed upon the eligible list if they have a percentage of 65; so that they have an advantage of 5 points.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Then, after they have passed the examination, is there any preference in taking them on the list that is

Mr. BROSIUS. They go to the head of the eligible list and are certified. That is the whole of that. I ask for the previous question

Mr. DINGLEY. Suppose three are certified; does that give any preference?

Mr. BROSIUS. No; not at all.
The previous question was ordered.
The SPEAKER. There is a committee amendment which the Clerk will report.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Page 2, line 21, after the word "capacity," insert the word "necessary."

The amendment was adopted.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BROSIUS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I have a small bill which really ought to be passed, but it is not on this Calendar, and my inquiry is, whether it is permissible in this hour to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole? The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. BROSIUS. Then I have nothing further at this time.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker—
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California rises to a question of personal privilege. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, last Friday I made

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, last Friday I made some remarks upon the bill then pending before the House, known as the Pacific Railroad funding bill. In the course of my remarks, in order to illustrate the weakness of the opposition to the bill coming from California, I undertook to state the real, secret, underlying causes of that opposition, and I did it openly, boldly, knowing whereof I spoke, and being responsible for what I said. During the debate the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Coonwill made some personal remarks] in reference to average I. COOPER] made some personal remarks in reference to myself. I was unable to get the floor on Friday to reply to him. On Saturday I was unable to reply to him because he was not in the Hall, The floor was tendered to me two or three times by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] then in the chair, but I declined to accept it because the gentleman from Wisconsin was still absent from the Hall. Yesterday I was unable to get the floor. The gentleman from Wisconsin is absent now, and therefore I shall have nothing to say in reference to his attack. The House, on the 7th day of this month, upon the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Hubbard], passed a resolution authorizing members who had participated in the debate upon the funding bill to extend their remarks in the Record. I am not familiar with the rule or the practice of the House with reference to the extent of that privilege. Speaking as one man and as a humble member of the legal profession, I would understand such a resolution to mean that a member, having addressed the House upon a pending measure, would be permitted to amplify the remarks that he had made upon the bill, and not to go outside of that.

I was informed yesterday by two or three members of this House, among them my honorable friend from North Carolina [Mr.

Linney], that the gentleman from California, from the Fourth Congressional district [Mr. Maguire], intended to assail me personally upon the floor yesterday, and to call me to account for what I had said, not with reference to himself, but with reference what I had said, not with reference to himself, but with reference to some one else. I waited here yesterday all day, though not well, in order to be prepared for the "roasting" that I was to receive, and to endeavor, with the permission of the Chair, in a feeble manner, to reply to anything that might be said. This morning my attention is called to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, where I find, upon pages 706 and 707, what purports to be a speech delivered by the gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE], in which one whole column is devoted to a bitter personal assault upon myself. That speech was not delivered upon the floor of this House. That speech was not delivered anywhere, except by writing it upon paper, handing it to the Reporter, and having it printed in the RECORD. RECORD.

I am not here, Mr. Speaker, to say anything in reference to whether or not that is a violation of the rules of the House. I leave that question for other, older, and more experienced members to determine. But I am here to endeavor to say a few words with reference to the matters contained therein, in order that the antidote may go with the poison, for whatever may be the view of the House with reference to that which I deem to be a violation of its rules, whatever may be the action of the House with referor its rules, whatever may be the action of the House with regrence to what I deem to be a wanton and malicious disregard of the rights of a member of this House, and a wanton breaking of a rule of this House in publishing a personal attack upon a brother member, in his absence, under the guise of extending remarks made upon the floor, whatever may be the action of this House, whether it shall permit this matter to stand in the RECORD, or shall expressed it or shall take no action the attack has already shall expunge it, or shall take no action, the attack has already gone broadcast all over the United States under the sanction of having been delivered in this House, when it never was, and I therefore have a right to speak upon it. In addition, I am handed to-day by a brother member of this House, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Mozley], a copy of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat of Monday morning, in which the correspondent of that paper says Mr. Maguire is going to roast me; is going to allude to what has happened in my life; is going, in his language, to "cause Grove Johnson's alleged skeletons to be led forth," and he states what Mr. MAGUIRE says he is going to say in reference to the

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, this was no sudden burst of wrath. was intended by the gentleman from California to be given to the people, and to be given without allowing me an opportunity to be heard, and to be given in what it seems to me is a cowardly and unmanly manner. I would not, in order to secure the success of any measure in which I may be interested, assail a member of this House in his absence to secure a unanimous vote; and my

this House in his absence to secure a unanimous vote; and my action with reference to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], which is known to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], shows that I would not.

Now, what is said in reference to me? And I have a right to speak of it now, because telegraphic advices that I have received from California state to me that Mr. William R. Hearst has already with lighted in the columns of his paper, the San Francisco Francisco from California state to me that Mr. William R. Hearst has already published in the columns of his paper, the San Francisco Examiner, the speech alleged to have been made by Mr. MAGUIRE upon this floor, and in addition, that he has published the echoes of a speech delivered against me in 1871, in which certain of my youthful actions were brought to light, and in which I was made to appear in every manner possible for a man to appear when he was not being put in a proper attitude. Inasmuch, therefore, as this has been published; inasmuch as every member of this House receives a copy of the Examiner free of charge; inasmuch as on Friday morning that paper will be placed upon the desk of every member, again reiterating the statements of the gentleman from California, I may just as well face this matter and answer this question now as to wait until then question now as to wait until then.

In this speech alleged to have been made by the gentleman from California [Mr. Maguire] he does not speak of matters directly. He dares not. In this House he made no remarks, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Hepburn] told him the reason why. In this speech he makes a cowardly insinuation against me, but has not the courage to state it openly and frankly. In that he is lacking the courage of the man that ordered him to assail me, William R. Hearst.

I accept the insinuation. I am not here to seek shelter behind anything. I am here to meet any charge that can be made against me and to explain every action in my life, if need be, that has been alluded to by this man in what I think a cowardly and unmanly attack upon me.

It is true, sir, that thirty-four years ago I was in trouble in the State of New York. It is true, sir, that thirty-four years ago I was indicted. It is true, sir, that thirty-four years ago I did go to the State of California to endeavor to rear a new home for myself. It is untrue that I went there under any name except myself. It is untrue that I went there under any name except that of Grove L. Johnson, as the gentleman from Syracuse [Mr. Poole], who has known me from boyhood, knows. I went to Sacramento. I settled there in 1865 as Grove L. Johnson, well knowing the charge against me, the people in Syracuse well knowing it and my residence in Sacramento. I worked in Sacramento day in and day out, and by the blessing of God and the help of my wife and through my own labor I was able to pay back every dollar of indebtedness that I owed in the city of Syracuse in the State of New York. Houd applause.] Every charge cuse, in the State of New York. [Loud applause.] Every charge against me was dismissed. The very men that had suffered pecuniary loss at my hands were the first ones to congratulate me upon my success. And I visited Syracuse in 1870, and nearly every year since—always as Grove L. Johnson.

year since—always as Grove L. Johnson.

Now, while in Sacramento every man knew me, I am not of that sort, as you all know, that can sit idly by without taking part in any fight or discussion. Why, sir, it is natural to me to indulge in politics and to fight, and I always fight hard. I am perfectly willing to receive as well as to give blows. And California is not the most peaceable country in the world. I have always been indulging in political battles there. Every man in California, every man in Sacramento, knew of my past history. I never concealed it. Why, sir, with full knowledge of all these charges against me, I became a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows; and notwithstanding that every Odd Fellow in my city and in my State knew of these charges I was elevated to the highest position nearly in the order, and met in sovereign grand lodge with my learned friend from Connecticut [Mr. Hill] as a representative of the grand lodge of the State of California. They knew what I had done, but they knew that I had tried to live an honest life in California, and unlike this human hyena from the Fourth district [Mr. MAGUIRE] they did not dig up the grave of the past in order to injure my wife, my children, and myself, but they met me as one man should meet another.

I became, Mr. Speaker, with a full knowledge of these matters, a member of the Improved Order of Red Men, and have filled the

I became, Mr. Speaker, with a full knowledge of these matters, a member of the Improved Order of Red Men, and have filled the highest offices in the gift of that order in the State of California, and met with its great council of the United States, as the honorand met with its great council of the United States, as the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Moody] can testify, and as the honorable gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LOUDENSLAGER] knows. And every man in that order knew of these charges and this talk against me, and that I had been assailed in this manner. With reference to other orders, it was the same. I am a member and officer of the Druids, the Knights of Pythias, and other kindred fraternal societies just the same, and I became a member of and president of the Exempt Firemen's Association of Sacramento with all of this knowledge before those who elected me in all of these organizations. And in 1877 I was a candidate for a member of the assembly in Sacramento County. I went before that convention, and I said to the members of the convention, "Gentlemen, I will tell you my history." I told them the truth about these charges. I said I had been indicted, but that I had paid off every dollar of my indebtedness. I said to them, "I do not want any member of this body to vote for me and after he has cast his vote be permitted to say that had he known of these things he would have voted against me." president of the Exempt Firemen's Association of Sacramento would have voted against me."

After that statement these men of Sacramento, with a knowledge of all of these charges, gave me the nomination by a three-fourths majority, and I was elected by an overwhelming majority in my own county. Afterwards I served my term as an assemblyman, and was nominated unanimously to the State senate and elected, receiving the highest vote of any candidate. That was the condition of affairs then, although every man in that county knew of my life and the circumstances connected with my going to California.

Afterwards I was renominated for the State senate, and afterwards I carried my county unanimously, as the nominee for member of Congress in 1892, in the face of these charges, although I was beaten in the nomination in the district. In 1894 I was unanimously nominated for Congress, and again had the support of the people of my district, and notwithstanding the fact that these charges were again scattered throughout the district, with a full knowledge of my history, I was unanimously nominated and triumphantly elected, being the first Republican elected from the

I speak of these things, Mr. Speaker, to show that I never concealed that sad blot on my life. I speak of it to show to you and to this House and to the country that I am not afraid of my life. Can every man in the United States, can every member of this House, say the same thing as boldly and courageously as I do? I know I did wrong. I have repented of it, and I have paid up all of the obligations that I contracted. I have made amends for it, and the people with whom I have lived and have been associated have known of the facts. Since then in Sacramento I have built up a name and fame and I have been honored with the nomina-up a name and fame and I have been honored with the nominations and elections to important offices, and the confidence of the men who know me in that community has been given unto me.

In 1896 I was renominated for Congress, and the bitterest fight against me was made that was ever made against any man on earth. You, Mr. Speaker, yourself have knowledge of that fact, because you were present in California and took part in that campaign; the honorable gentleman from Maine [Mr. Boutelle] knows of the fact, for he was present and participated in the campaign, as also did the honorable gentlemen from Massachusetts [Mr. MoCall and Mr. Apsley]. They can all testify to the condition of affairs existing when they were present in my district. And yet, Mr. Speaker, in view of those facts, despite the bitter fight made against me personally, and although Sacramento County gave 300 majority for Bryan, I carried every election district in the city of Sacramento, my home, receiving nearly 1,200 majority in the county. [Applause.] The district is Democratic; it gave Bryan over 2,000 majority.

I refer to this, sir, to show that the people of Sacramento, who

I refer to this, sir, to show that the people of Sacramento, who know me well, and who knew of the charges made against me, regarded them as they would the rattle in the tail of a toothless snake, which is heard without exciting alarm. But during that entire campaign, from the very beginning to the end of it, I was the recipient of the vilest abuse from the paper conducted by this man Hearst-the vilest abuse that was ever heaped on a man. That paper was filled with the bitterest slanders and the vilest caricatures of myself. Every man here has received a copy of it. caricatures of myself. Every man here has received a copy of it. You gentlemen who were present in our State during that canvass know the facts of which I speak. You know how our honored Speaker was caricatured by that paper during the campaign, because you were present and saw it. You know how bitter were the assaults that were made upon him. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] knows how he was assailed by that infamous paper; but the bitterness of the assaults upon our honored Speaker were but as drops of water compared to the roar of the cataract of Niagara to the assaults that were made on me. I am a man, with all the sentiments and feelings of a man, and can stand a reasonable amount of punishment, although I am not invulnerable to every shaft. But in addition, while my wife lay sick upon her bed during the campaign, from which sickness the doctors said she might not perhaps recover, this infamous wretch sent copies of his paper to my wife; and in order that she might be given the agony of reading the abuse of her husband, he cut out the editorials and the caricatures from his paper, put them in envelopes, sealed them, and sent them to her as correspondence, until opes, sealed them, and sent them to her as correspondence, until the doctor directed my daughters never to give my wife a letter until they had first read it themselves to know what was in it.

Is it wonderful that, having been assailed in this manner, I struck back when the opportunity came? Is there a man here who would do less, except the gentleman from the Fourth district, I was G. Macquare. Is there a man here who would not proved the second of the second who would do less, except the gentleman from the Fourth district, JAMES G. MAGUIRE? Is there a man here who would not protect his wife? Is there any man here who would not protect his wife? Is there any man here who would not protect himself? I have no newspaper. I did what I did boldly. I knew the attacks would be made upon me. I knew I would be assailed in the columns of this paper. I knew I would be assailed by others, but I did not expect to be attacked in this cowardly, this unmanly, this underhanded method of printing in the Record a speech that never was delivered in the House. There is a race of men in Ireland called "informers." There is a race of men in Italy called "bravos." There is a race of men in Russia called "paid police spies." Either one of those would have scorned to do what the gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE] did with reference to me. Now, Mr. Speaker, I say to you, I say to the House, that in this tleman from California [Mr. Maguire] did with reference to me. Now, Mr. Speaker, I say to you, I say to the House, that in this matter I did what I thought was right. I had a right to oppose any measure or to favor it. I had the right to favor the funding bill. The gentleman running the San Francisco Examiner had a right to oppose it. He had no right to abuse and to vilify me because I favored it. He had a right to discuss it freely and logically, and yet he saw fit, without other cause—for I appeal confidently to the columns of that paper, to the fact that they never assailed anything in my Congressional life except my friendship for the funding bill—without other reason he abused and maligned me, as I have stated, and I struck back. I think I did right. It may be that other men are so tinctured with the teachings of the meek and lowly One who taught us from Calvary's Mount that meek and lowly One who taught us from Calvary's Mount that they would sit quietly by and not attempt to defend themselves. It may be that other members of this House would do that, but I can not. I have never been taught to believe that it was good doctrine in public life, "if a man smite thee on one cheek, to turn the other," and if he smote you on that cheek, then I always thought it was right, in the language of Brigham Young, to do the best you could to defend yourself and punish him. So in this I have attempted to explain Hearst's connection with the matter. I have attempted to speak of his conduct with reference to this matter in proper terms. I feel that I did what was right.

Every charge that I and what was right.

Every charge that I made against Hearst is capable of proof.

I do not shelter myself behind my constitutional privilege.

Whatever I say as a Congressman I am responsible for personally and pecuniarily as a man. I have nothing to hide. My life is and pecuniarily as a man. I have nothing to hide. My life is open. I have told you here to-day of it because of the assault made upon me. I ask you now is it right, I ask you is it manly, I ask you is it decent, for one man to assail another in this underask you is it decent, for one man to assair another in this underhanded and what I deem cowardly manner as the gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE] has so wickedly attacked me. I ask you gentlemen from the Sunny South, in whose veins is supposed to run blood that is hotter than in those from the other parts of the nation, I ask you if you indorse that kind of an attack, to assail a man without notice, to give notice to all the newspaper reporters that you propose to attack a man in the House, and then to print your remarks in the RECORD that you never made upon the floor of the House?

the floor of the House?

Go you to the mountains and plains of Tennessee, go you to the mountains and plains of South Carolina, go you to the mountains and plains of Mississippi, go you to the vast plains of Missouri, go you all over the South, go you to Virginia, that mother of States and statesmen; ask your people there if they indorse that kind of treatment of one man by another. And the answer you know, for you know it in your hearts, you know what the answer wald be, that they would say to you as one man, RICHARDSON, and CATCHARDSON, and TALBERT and HALL, and OTEY, and SWANSON. be, that they would say to you as one man, RICHARDSON, and CATCHINGS, and TALBERT, and HALL, and OTEY, and SWANSON, and McMillin, they would say, "Repudiate such attacks upon a brother member, or we will forever hurl you from power in these States." And I appeal to you men from the North, men whose blood does not course with the same fiery vigor, but men that knowing your rights, dare maintain them, men who in the cooler winds of the North think twice before you act once, I appeal to you; is it right, is it decent, is it manly thus to attack a man behind his back? I appeal to you, the patriarch of this House, that men are glad to honor, the man who was Speaker thirty-four years ago. Search your recollection and see if even the antebellum days brought out an incident like this.

So, if you can take your mind back to the time when Pryor and days brought out an incident like this.

So, if you can take your mind back to the time when Pryor and Potter and Burlingame had their discussions, see if any man attacked another in this cowardly and underhanded method. And you, from the great States of Pennsylvania and New York; and you from the State of Ohio; and you gentlemen from New England, that is always true to the right, I ask you is it right, is it decent, is it manly, that a man should be attacked in this underhanded—in my judgment cowardly, indecent, and unmanly—way in which I have been assailed by the person who represents the Fourth Congressional district of California? I ask you to answer to yourselves; I ask you to ask your wives as to whether it is right. I ask you to ask your God when you go before him in the solitude of your chamber is it right. I submit that it is wrong. [Applause.]

It may be said I assailed a man that was not present; and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], speaking of it, said I was cowardly in so doing. Cowardly in assailing a man who had assailed me for more than a year, that lives in New York, that is safely ensconced in the fortress of his house in New York, who sends his order 3,500 miles to California to have me attacked when I can not reply nor see him! Is that cowardly? If the gentleman from Wisconsin thinks that I am at all cowardly, or if the gentleman from California thinks I am at all cowardly, let either of them repeat to me outside this Chamber what they said in this Chamber, and their curiosity will be appeased. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to trespass longer upon your time. I have to say to you that I have spoken out of the fullness of my heart. It is not an easy matter to be compelled to speak of these things. It is not an easy matter; but I submit to you that in every civilized nation on earth there is a statute of limitations So, if you can take your mind back to the time when Pryor and of my heart. It is not an easy matter to be compelled to speak of these things. It is not an easy matter; but I submit to you that in every civilized nation on earth there is a statute of limitations running against every grade of crime. The physiologists tell us that man changes every seven years; and here for thirty-four years I have lived in California. For thirty-four years I have tried to make a living for myself, my children, and my grandchildren who have been born unto me (and I have taken good care of them); and now, in my old age, when I can only look backward and not forward in life; when but few more years are given to me; when I ought to be permitted to enjoy a few years of peace, is it right I ought to be permitted to enjoy a few years of peace, is it right that a man should go back thirty-four years and unlock the doors of the secret recesses of the past to bring up the skeleton of my youthful conduct before you and exhibit it to the people of the United States, especially in this sneaking, cowardly manner? Is it right? Ought not there to be a statute of limitations to the past of a man? Is it right that a man should thus be cowardly assailed? If I should say what I was going to say, it would not be proper. I say, is it right, is it proper to go back thirty-four years in the life of a man and bring out the follies and crimes of his youth and forever throw them at him?

I beg of you to deal in this matter fairly; and I say, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, in conclusion, that I have tried to do my duty as a member of Congress, that I have always done what I deemed to be proper. Sometimes I may have spoken perhaps harshly, but always I have been willing to do everything to help my brother members. I have tried to do my duty. I have never concealed my feelings or my thoughts in my life—I never have here in this House—and I submit this question to you now. I submit to you older men, upon whose heads has fallen that frost that knows no melting until the summons of Azrael, the King of Death, is heard melting until the summons of Azrael, the King of Death, is heard by you. I submit it to you younger men, who rejoice in the future pleasures of life; I submit it to you all—is it right that a man should be assailed in this manner? Is it right that there should be no limit to the abuse of newspapers when they seek to terrorize a man from the performance of what he deems to be his duty? Is it right for a coward thus to strike a secret blow, as this man from California [Mr. MAGUIRE] has done? May the day come in the history of this nation when men will be judged absolutely by their acts in the present, when no man, no newspaper, will be in the history of this nation when men will be judged absolutely by their acts in the present, when no man, no newspaper, will be permitted to assail a man by delving into the mysterious recesses of the past, to bring sorrow to his wife, sorrow to his children, sorrow to his grandchildren, and sorrow to his gray hairs, when he is trying to make a living for his children and doing his duty to his God. [Applause.]

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the speech of the gentleman from California [Mr. Johnson], I desire to say that I never printed anything anywhere in my life or asked another to print it or to say it that I was not myself ready to say in the presence of any man on earth.

nce of any man on earth.

On Friday last, sir, one of the most remarkable, one of the most outrageous, one of the most malicious speeches that I ever heard, or that in my opinion was ever delivered in a respectable assembly of geutlemen, was delivered by the gentleman from California. It contained an assault upon an absent man, upon a man who had no right to defend himself or even to say nay in this presence; upon a man who had no legal right to put even his presence; upon a man who had no legal right to put even his denial of the false charges made against him in the permanent RECORD of this House to which the gentleman from California committed his charges.

I was unable on Saturday to complete my speech, which was interrupted by the expiration of my time before I reached the part of which the gentleman complains. I could not get the floor again to complete it, although I had been assured by gentlemen who would, I thought, be able to control the matter that I should have fifteen or twenty minutes, as I had been excluded from the general debate. or twenty minutes, as I had been excluded from the general debate. I was unable to finish my speech because of the persistent objection of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Hepburn]. On Monday I came here with the intention of delivering that part of my speech to which the gentleman from California refers upon a question of personal privilege, and discussed with the Speaker the question of my right to rise to a question of privilege concerning these particular matters. The Speaker, after consideration, took the view, and I think properly, that I had no right to deliver that part of my Saturday's speech upon a question of privilege. There was then no means left to me to defend the man whom the gentleman from California had so unjustly, so cowardly, so falsely assailed upon this floor but to print in the Record, under the permission given by the House, the remainder of my speech as it would have apon this floor but to print in the RECORD, under the permission given by the House, the remainder of my speech as it would have been delivered had it not been for the objections of the gentleman from Iowa. The only difference between that part of the speech as it appears in the RECORD and as it would have been delivered on the floor if I had had the opportunity to so deliver it is that the speech in the RECORD is mild by comparison.

That part of the speech to which the gentleman refers makes no direct assault upon the gentleman from California, except that no direct assault upon the gentleman from California, except that it brands as false certain statements which he made. Any member of the House might read the speech from beginning to end without discovering any unparliamentary reference to the gentleman. [Expressions of dissent.] It was only because his knowledge enabled him to identify the man described in the picture I had drawn of the author of the most malicious, malignant charge relating to the early life, to the boyhood of an absent man whom he had so cowardly assailed, that he felt so outraged. He has spoken of a statement published in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat numbering to set forth what I was going to say. I have no recolspoken or a statement published in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat purporting to set forth what I was going to say. I have no recollection of having been interviewed by anybody representing the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, and I have not seen the article to which the gentleman refers, but it was an open secret that I intended to defend and vindicate my friend Mr. Hearst, whom the gentleman had foully assailed, and to whose noble and honored mother he sought to bring the grief and anguish which he whines about having brought to members of his own family by statements which he knew Mr. Hearst himself would allow to pass him as the idle wind which he respects not.

It was well known that I would reply. It was well known to the gentleman himself that if I had an opportunity I would not permit the character or reputation of a friend of mine to stand undefended or unvindicated any more than I would permit the same assault upon myself to pass unchallenged. The gentleman whines about what he calls the attack upon himself. He thinks only of himself—his own self-loving self. He thinks not of grief, thinks not of trouble, thinks not of anguish, until it strikes the only man on earth he cares about—himself. Why did he not think of these things before making an assault on Mr. Hearst. Why did he not think of what the people of the Southern States, and the people of the Northern States, and the people of the Western States, would think of such a cowardly assault? The man who has made this whining, weeping, tearful speech before you this morning, pleading with you to believe that I should not have replied to him as I did, used this language concerning an absent man, whose character or whose life, either in boyhood or in manhood, was not in question here. He said:

(Reading paragraphs 7, 8, 9, and 10 of the first column on page 710 of the daily Record.)

The gentleman from California said these things of an absent man. They are false, and it ill becomes him, after using that language, to whine about my answer to his charges. [Applause.] He need not concern himself about my courage or that of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Cooper]. In California I should pay little heed to what the gentleman says; but here, with his right to print in the Record, with his right to make a permanent record of whatever he may choose to say in the way of vilification of other men, it is quite different.

He states, by way of justification of his attack on Mr. Hearst on Friday last, that Mr. Hearst during the last campaign had sent editorials and caricatures denouncing him and holding him up to ridicule to his wife while she was sick. Mr. Hearst has not been in California for over a year, except perhaps for two or three days on business, when he had no time to thi into the RECORD under the circumstances which I have detailed. It was a part of my speech of Saturday, only a portion of which I had an opportunity to deliver. It was in answer to an argument made in favor of the Pacific Railroad funding bill, and the part of which the gentleman complains is confined strictly to answering the charge. I have no apology to make for having pursued that course. I would have made the statements on the pursued that course. I would have made the statements on the floor if I had had the opportunity. Not having that opportunity, I printed the whole of the speech that I was here to deliver, under the permission given by the House to members speaking, to complete their speeches in the RECORD when they had not time to deliver them in full on the floor.

Mr. POOLE. Mr. Speaker, I very much dislike being brought into this controversy, but I find my friend of nearly fifty years ago assailed in a bitter and a cowardly manner, and I can not sit in my seat and keep quiet under such a condition of things.

my seat and keep quiet under such a condition of things.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order.

It is impossible for us to hear what the gentleman is saying. I ask for order.

The SPEAKER. The House is somewhat in confusion, but the Chair has no doubt it will be in order at once.

Order having been restored,
Mr. POOLE. The gentleman from California, GROVE L. JOHNSON, was my playmate in youth, and I feel honored by his acquaintance to-day.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. So far as the parties to this controversy are concerned, I take the same view that every other member of the House seems to have taken, in favor of giving the greatest latitude to their statements, but it strikes me there ought to be something before the House before the gentleman from New York [Mr. POOLE] proceeds with his remarks. If the gentleman will state any question of privilege to which he has the right to rise, I would be the last to controver his right in that respect. But as the two principals in this controversy have been heard, it strikes me, unless what the gentleman from New York is about to submit pertains to a question of privilege, this debate should not be extended.

Mr. POOLE. Before I conclude my remarks, which will be very short—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York can only address the House by unanimous consent, in view of the objection.

Mr. POOLE. Well, I ask unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to make a statement to the House. Is there objections.

Mr. McMILLIN. To what does the gentleman propose to direct his remarks? I think that is a pertinent inquiry, because if the gentleman obtains unanimous consent he will have the floor for an hour.

Mr. POOLE. I shall move, at the proper time, to expunge from

Mr. FOOLE. I shall move, at the proper time, to expunge from the RECORD a portion of the remarks—

Mr. McMILLIN. Then I suggest, if the gentleman is going to move any proceeding of the House, that his remarks will more properly come on his motion. With all kindness, I suggest to him that that is the letter way to the state.

properly come on his motion. With all kindness, I suggest to him that that is the better way to proceed.

Mr. POOLE. Mr. Speaker, I move now to expunge from the Record the speech said to have been delivered by Mr. Magures and published in this morning's Record.

Mr. McMillin. I will inquire of the gentleman whether he proposes to do that without having read at the desk the remarks to be expunged? The proper course, it seems to me, would be to dispose of the matter upon a motion to refer it to the appropriate committee, as was done in the case of the controversy of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Walker] with Mr. Williams and others in a former session. I shall not resist any motion the gentleman may make in that direction, but I hope that whatever may be done will be regularly done, and think reference to a committee of the House best.

may be done will be regularly done, and think reference to a committee of the House best.

Mr. POOLE. Mr. Speaker, I will send to the desk the Record and ask that the portions I have marked be expunged from the Record; and on that motion I wish to speak.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is it proper, Mr. Speaker, to offer an amendment at this time? If so, I should like to move an amendment that the remarks of a personal character which have been delivered by the gentleman from California [Mr. Johnson] against Mr. Hearst and reflecting on his past be also expunged. Mr. Hearst and reflecting on his past be also expunged.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that would be in order. The Clerk will report the proposition of the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, on page 707 of the Congressional Record, the following words: "The foulest and falsest of the gentleman's charges—"

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will simply indicate the part of the RECORD the gentleman from New York proposes to strike out. The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "detail," in the second paragraph.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York must put his proposition in writing.

Mr. POOLE. Very well, Mr. Speaker.

I now move to strike out the language that I have marked in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will indicate the language.

The Clerk read as follows;

Strike out in the second column on page 707 of the RECORD the paragraph commencing with the words "The foulest and falsest," and ending with the words "unscrupulous revenge."

Mr. McMILLIN. I make the point, with the view to determining the matter, that this must be referred to the proper committee under the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks if it is a question of privilege the House must pass upon it.

Mr. McMILLIN. I had no doubt about what the ruling of the Chair would be. I therefore move, Mr. Speaker, its reference to the Committee on Rules.

Chair would be. I therefore move, Mr. Speaker, its reference to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from New York is first entitled to be heard.

Mr. McMILLIN. Certainly.

Mr. POOLE. Mr. Speaker, in making this motion I am actuated by only one motive. The attack of the gentleman from California [Mr. Magure] upon my friend from California, Grove L. Johnson, erroneous in many important particulars, as I think I can explain to the House, and as such I do not think that the gentleman from California himself [Mr. Magure] can afford to have the language which he has inserted in the Record remain as a part of the official records of this body.

I have known Grove L. Johnson, as I was saying a few moments ago, ever since boyhood. We were schoolmates almost fifty years ago, and I have known him all his life, and am proud to have been always his friend. He was as bright a scholar as any in the district school in the city of Syracuse, where he was born, and where he was raised. He comes of an excellent family, his father, whom I well remember, being a member of the bar. After graduating with honor at the high school of Syracuse he studied law and built up a good practice. He was elected time after time a member of the school board of the city, and was popular and respected because of the same good qualities which he has exhibited upon this floor.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that at one time in his life he had the misfortune to become very heavily involved in debt. He then did what other men in similar circumstances have done—left his home and went westward; but he went under his own name, and we all knew where he could be found. There was no concealment about it. We all knew where he was; we knew where he could be found, and that he could have been returned at any time if desired. But we did not care to send for him. We all had faith in GROVE L. Johnson; we knew that he was a man of honor, and that although he had made mistakes, if he was given time he would redeem himself, as he did. It was but a very few months before the charge that he was in hiding was proved to be false. It was scarcely two months after leaving his home before he sent money back to partially redeem the outstanding indebtedness, and to-day he deemed ever a deller. And not only that Mr. Speaker not he does not owe a dollar. And not only that, Mr. Speaker, not only did he pay the principal of the debt, but he paid interest upon it. He comes back there year after year, and GROVE L. JOHNSON is respected and liked by all of our people.

Mr. Speaker, when a man in after life has, as GROVE L. JOHNSON has done, attempted to prove and sustain his honor, he should not be said the provent of this door who knows nothing of has done, attempted to prove and sustain his honor, he should not be assailed by a gentleman on this floor who knows nothing of the circumstances except what he may have heard through the slanders in the San Francisco Examiner, and I think it would be unjust to the gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE] to allow the words that he has uttered to remain in the permanent records of this Congress in the speech which was published in the RECORD this morning.

I hope, sir, the motion will prevail. I reserve the remainder of my time.

my time.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to discuss the motion at the present time, and I address my remarks to the gentlemen on the other side. I think the proper course is to refer this to an appropriate committee. We had just such a precedent in a former Congress under the alleged abuse of the privilege of printing by a gentleman from Massachusetts against one of his colleagues from that State, Mr. Williams, and the House on that occasion, when its attention was called to it, took the course I have suggested and referred the matter to a committee of the House for consideration and report, and finally disposed of it upon the comconsideration and report, and finally disposed of it upon the committee's report.

mittee's report.

The committee can report what, if anything, ought to be stricken out. I make this suggestion the more readily because the committee can take cognizance of the whole speech; can say what ought to go out and what should not, if anything. I hope there will be no objection, therefore, to that suggestion, and they can report at any time. I would suggest that it be referred to the Committee on Printing. They have charge of matters of printing; or any other committee to which it is referred will be satisfactory to me.

factory to me.

factory to me.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, if it is proposed to refer this matter to the Committee on Printing, I may as well say now for myself that I would be unwilling to review matter that has gone into the Record by consent of the House in debate on the floor. If it was objectionable, any member at that time could have risen in his place and objected, and it would not have appeared. Now, the only question involved is as to this matter printed in the Record, under consent of the House, as to whether if it had been offered or spoken on the floor it would have been objected to at that time. Repeatedly, for myself, I have protested against this general consent to print. I do not believe in it. I believe that the Record should contain only the matter spoken here upon the floor, or some paper which the House directly gives its consent to be printed in the Record. The only question that would come before the committee upon this reference would be this language which is cited to the House now, upon page 707 of the Record. which is cited to the House now, upon page 707 of the RECORD. It occurs to me that if the House desires to act upon this matter, It occurs to me that if the House desires to act upon this matter, it has all the information that any committee could give, and is competent to act now as well as at any other time. The committee, I can say for myself, would not be willing to consider this matter which has preceded and which has been spoken on the floor in the presence of the members, when an opportunity was open for any member to object if he saw fit.

Mr. McMILLIN. I would suggest to the gentleman that the course I have indicated is the one always taken in cases of this kind. I have known no variation from it; and it strikes me that another day is a better time to settle a matter of this sort, and if another day is a better time to settle a matter of this sort, and if another day is a better time to settle a matter of this sort, and if for no other reason, I think the reference should be made.

Mr. PERKINS. For myself, I am as ready now to report as at any other time. I am in favor of striking that language out of the permanent RECORD. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNE. I desire to move an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman offers an amendment. Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to ask whether the motion which suggested before might not come in now as an amendment.

The SPEAKER. There is already one amendment offered, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding "to strike out also paragraphs 8, 9, and 10 on page 705 of the RECORD, beginning with the words, 'We knew he was erotic' and ending with the words 'though tattooed with sin.'"

Mr. NORTHWAY. I rise to a point of order—that that is not

Mr. DOCKERY. Would it be in order to move to refer the whole matter to the Committee on Rules?

Mr. McMILLIN. I have no objection and no preference as to what committee it is referred to. I think it ought to be referred.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves that the matter be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.
Mr. DOCKERY demanded a division.

Mr. TOWNE. A privileged motion, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri has a privileged Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present the following report from the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. McMILLIN (to Mr. Towne). Yours is a privileged motion.

Mr. TOWNE. I desire to present a motion of privilege. It pertains to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The SPEAKER. Is that the purpose for which the gentleman Mr. TOWNE. It is.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized.
Mr. TOWNE. I offer the motion which I send to the Clerk's The Clerk read as follows: Strike from the RECORD the following language, being the seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth paragraphs in the first column of page 705.

Mr. GROUT. It can be read by unanimous consent. I desire to vote, and I do not know how to vote.

Mr. HICKS. What is the language? Mr. HICKS. What is the language?
The SPEAKER. The gentleman will find it in the RECORD.
Mr. HICKS. On what page?
The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Clerk will read the resolution. Mr. McMILLIN. I believe the yeas and nays have been ordered, and we may just as well proceed.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. HICKS. I just wanted to know what the matter was.

Mr. McMILLIN. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. HICKS. I merely wanted attention called to where it is in the RECORD. Mr. McMILLIN. I withdraw my objection to its being read, if the gentleman desires it. Mr. SWANSON. It is a very small part to be stricken out, and I ask that all of it be read.

The SPEAKER. The difficulty about describing it in the resolution is, you put it in at the same time you order it to be stricken Mr. McMILLIN. That was the cause of my objection.
Mr. PAYNE. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Minnesota if his resolution refers to the same language that was read by the gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE] in his resolution this morning?

Mr. TOWNE. It does, substantially.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. BINGHAM. If he were present, I should vote in the affirmative.

The following additional pairs were announced on this question:
Mr. Grout with Mr. Charles W. Stone.
Mr. Wellington with Mr. Hicks.
Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I voted on this question, but I am not certain that I had a right to do so. Therefore, in order to be certainly on the safe side, I withdraw my vote.

The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas are 82 and the nays are 94. Mr. Foote of New York, Mr. Barrett of Massachusetts, Mr. Hubbard of Missouri, Mr. Dockery of Missouri, Mr. Wheeler of Alabama, and Mr. Johnson of California are present and not voting. These members, together with those voting, constitute a quorum, and the resolution is rejected.

J. HERMAN BARNESLEY.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the report from the Committee on Accounts which I have already sent to the desk.

The report was read, as follows:

The report was read, as follows:

"Resolved, That the compensation of J. Herman Barnesley, now on the folders' roll of the department of the Doorkeper, be increased from $720 per annum to $1,200 per annum, he, the said J. Herman Barnesley, performing in an efficient and satisfactory manner the duties of an assistant doorkeeper and of messenger to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and said increased sum being the minimum customary rate for such services; and that said extra compensation be paid by the Clerk out of the contingent fund of the House."

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the resolution providing that the compensation of J. Herman Barnesley, now on the folders' roll, be increased from $720 per annum to $1,200 per annum, he, the said Herman J. Barnesley performing in an efficient and satisfactory manner the duties of an assistant doorkeeper and of messenger to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, said extra compensation to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, beg to report that they respectfully recommend that the same do not pass, for the reason that the resolution is in violation of the law which prohibits any increase of salaries to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. TRACEY. I ask for a vote.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

To discuss the resolution?

Mr. WANGER. Yes, sir. Mr. TRACEY. I move the previous question on the resolution. The previous question was ordered.
On a vote, the report was adopted; and the resolution was re-lected.

INVESTIGATION OF SOLDIERS' HOME, LEAVENWORTH, KANS.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, I have sent up also another report, which I desire to have read.

The report was read, as follows:

The report was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the chairman of the Special Committee to Investigate the Soldiers' Home at Leavenworth, Kans., be, and is hereby, authorized to expend the sum of $1,000, or such part thereof as may be necessary, to complete the investigation of said Home, to be accounted for in the manner prescribed by House resolution ordering said investigation, adopted June 9, 1896.

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the accompanying resolution authorizing the chairman of the Special Committee to Investigate the Soldiers' Home at Leavenworth, Kans., to expend the sum of $1,000, or such part thereof as may be necessary, to complete the investigation of said Home, beg to report that they respectfully recommend the passage of the same.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say with reference to this resolution that I have here the items of account—

Mr. RICHARDSON (interposing). Mr. Speaker, is this appropriation to be made out of the contingent fund of the House?

Mr. TRACEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. TRACEY. Yes, sir.
Mr. RICHARDSON. I did not understand the resolution as read to so provide. If it does not, I want to make a point of order

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, the original resolution authorizing the appointment of the committee made appropriation for the ayment of its expenses out of the contingent fund of the House. Mr. RICHARDSON. But I do not think this resolution does b. I may have misunderstood it in the reading, but I do not think it contains that provision.

Mr. TRACEY. My understanding is that it does.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will submit the question to the Speaker.

The SPEAKER (reading from the resolution). "And to be

The SPEAKER (reading from the resolution). "And to be accounted for in the manner prescribed by the House resolution ordering said investigation adopted June 9, 1896."

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, let me suggest that that continues the first resolution and practically appropriates this money out of the contingent fund of the House, because the original resolution makes the appropriation from the contingent fund.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think it is quite clear from the language of this resolution that the money is to come from the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is the point that I have made, Mr. Speaker. Unless that is the provision, the resolution is not privileged.

speaker. Onless that is the provision, the leged.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that it is well known to the House that the original resolution providing for the payment of the expenses of this special committee appropriates the money out of the contingent fund, and this is intended to folthe money out of the contingent fund, and this is intended to follow the original resolution.

Mr. DINGLEY. I suggest to the gentleman that it would be well to amend the resolution so as to make its meaning certain. It might be amended by inserting the words "to be paid from the contingent fund of the House."

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the resolution be so

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee withdraw his point of order?

his point of order?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not know anything about the merits of this proposition, Mr. Speaker, but I withdraw the point of order to let the gentleman make an explanation of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is withdrawn. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri, which is to insert after the words "said Home" the words "to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House."

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Missouri will permit me, I will suggest that there are two of these resolutions. The resolution originally introduced provided for an investigation. That resolution went to the Committee on Military Affairs. Subsequently a resolution of similar character went to the Committee. sequently a resolution of similar character went to the Committee on Accounts; and it was upon the latter resolution that the investigation was had. I think the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Tracey] will remember—the chairman of the investigating committee would remember if he were here—that the resolution provided for the payment of this expense out of the contingent fund of the House. I apprehend that the Speaker has before him the resolution that went to the Committee on Military Affairs instead of the one that went to the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Chair read from the resolution now pending; but by the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri the objection will be obviated.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. TRACEY, it was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF HON. CHARLES F. CRISP.

Mr. TRACEY also reported from the Committee on Accounts the following:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House to the widow of Charles F. Crisp, late a Representative in Congress from the State of Georgia, the expenses of the last illness and funeral of said Charles F. Crisp, such expenses amounting to $1,480.38.

The resolution was adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed with the call of com-

Mr. BENNETT. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was passed yesterday without prejudice. I wish to know whether it is in order for that committee to be called.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman desires it, that committee will be called now.

BUTLER AND PITTSBURG RAILROAD COMPANY.

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce having been called,

Mr. BENNETT. I desire to call up House bill No. 9072, to authorize the Butler and Pittsburg Railroad Company to construct a bridge across the Allegheny River. A Senate bill similar in its provisions to this has passed both Houses, has been approved by the President, and has become a law. In order that this House bill may be removed from the Calendar, I move that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS SULPHUR RIVER, ARKANSAS.

Mr. BENNETT. I call up the bill (S. 1722) to approve and ratify the construction of a bridge across the Sulphur River, in the State of Arkansas, by the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company

The bill was read.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as fol-

Add the following new section 5 between sections 4 and 5, and change number of present section 5 to 6.

"Sec. 5. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date of approval thereof."

Mr. BENNETT. I submit the report of the committee as a portion of my remarks.

The report (by Mr. Bartlett of New York) was read, as fol-

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1722) entitled "A bill to approve and ratify the construction of a bridge across the Sulphur River, in the State of Arkansas, by the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company," beg leave to submit the following report, and recommend that said bill do pass, with an amendment.

Add the following new section 5 between sections 4 and 5, and change number of present section 5 to 6.

"Sec. 5. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date of approval thereof."

The committee attach the following letter from Brigadier-General Craighill, Chief of Engineers, and make the same a part of this report:

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C., February 14, 1896.

Washington, D. C., February 14, 1896.

Sir: I have the honor to return herewith a letter, dated the 24th instant, from the Senate Committee on Commerce, inclosing, for the views of the War Department thereon, S. 1722, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session, "A bill to approve and ratify the construction of a bridge across the Sulphur River, in the State of Arkansas, by the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company," and, in reply to its reference to this office, I beg to say that I know of no objection to the passage of the bill by Congress, so far as the interests of navigation are concerned.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. P. CRAICHILL.

W. P. CRAIGHILL, Brigadier-General, Chief of Engineers.

Hon. DANIEL S. LAMONT, Secretary of War.

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to. Mr. OGDEN. I ask that this bill be ordered to a third reading and put on its passage.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BENNETT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGES ACROSS CUMBERLAND AND TENNESSEE RIVERS

Mr. BENNETT. I call up the bill (H. R. 8551) to establish railroad bridges across the Cumberland and Tennessee rivers in Kentucky

The bill was read.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as

At the end of line 11, section 2, add:
"Provided, That the length of the drawspans may be increased if, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, the interests of navigation demand it."
After the word "construction," in line 19, section 5, add "or after completion."

In the 2 of a think a construction.

tion."
In line 3 of section 6 strike out "five" and insert "three," and in line 4 strike out "eight" and insert "five."
Strike out section 7 and insert in lieu thereof the following:
"That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."
Strike out section 8.

Mr. BENNETT. I submit the report of the committee as a portion of my remarks.

The report (by Mr. Sherman) was read, as follows:

The report (by Mr. Sherman) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8551) to construct railroad bridges across the Cumberland and Tennessee rivers, in Kentucky, submit the following report:

The bill gives authority to the Cairo and Tennessee River Railroad Company to erect, construct, establish, and maintain railway bridges and approaches thereto across the Cumberland River, in the State of Kentucky, at points to be selected by said railroad, or its successors or assigns, between Rock-castle and Tobaccoport, in Trigg County, and also another bridge across said river between Burksville, on said river, in Kentucky, and the Tennessee State line, and also a bridge across the Tennessee River, between Pine Bluff, in Calloway County, Ky., and Birmingham, in Marshall County, Ky., to be selected by said railroad, or its successors or assigns, between said described points on said rivers, which said bridges shall not interfere with the free navigation of said rivers.

The bill has been submitted to the War Department, and under date of May 12 General Craighill suggests certain amendments to the bill; and if thus amended knows of no objection to its passage, so far as the interests of navigation are concerned.

The committee adopt the amendments, which are as follows:

At the end of line II, section 2, add:

"Provided, That the length of the drawspans may be increased if, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, the interests of navigation demand it."

After the word "construction," in line 19, section 5, add "or after completion."

In line 3 of section 6 strike out "five" and insert "three," and in line 4 strike out "eight" and insert "five."
Strike out section 7 and insert in lieu thereof the following:
"That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."
Strike out section 8,
As thus amended, the committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to. The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed. On motion of Mr. BENNETT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGES ACROSS THE RED RIVER OF THE NORTH.

Mr. BENNETT. I call up the bill (H. R. 8814) to authorize the construction by the Duluth and North Dakota Railroad Com-pany of two bridges across the Red River of the North, between the States of Minnesota and North Dakota.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, I submit, as a part of my remarks, the report of the committee accompanying the bill.

The report (by Mr. Sherman) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8814) to authorize the construction by the Duluth and North Dakota Railroad Company of two bridges across the Red River of the North, between the States of Minnesota and North Dakota, submit the following between the States of milinesous and North Dakota Railroad Company, report:

The bill provides "that the Duluth and North Dakota Railroad Company, a corporation duly created and existing under the law of the State of North Dakota, its successors or assigns, be, and it is hereby, authorized to construct and maintain a bridge and approaches thereto across the Red River of the North at two points on said river."

It has been submitted to the War Department, and, under date of May 19, General Craighill says:

"The bill makes ample provision for the protection of navigation interests, and I know of no objection to its passage by Congress, so far as those interests are concerned."

are concerned."

The bill is therefore reported with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BENNETT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MONONGAHELA RIVER.

Mr. BENNETT. I also call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 9733) to authorize the Union Railroad Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Monongahela River.

The bill was read at length.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BENNETT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS RED RIVER, ALEXANDRIA, LA.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I call up the bill (S. 1725) authorizing the Kansas City, Watkins and Gulf Railway Company to construct and maintain a bridge across Red River at the city of Alexandria, La.

The bill was read at length.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, it was passed.
On motion of Mr. PATTERSON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

AWARDS OF LIFE-SAVING MEDALS.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, by instruction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I call up for present consideration the bill (S. 2334) construing the acts of Congress in relation to the awards of life-saving medals.

The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas the Attorney-General, under date of January 30, 1895, has rendered an opinion that the statutes authorizing the award of life-saving medals apply to the rescue of those persons only who, in the vicinity of a life-saving station, lifeboat station, or house of refuge, are in danger of drowning in any of the waters over which the United States, by reason of their right to regulate foreign and interstate commerce, have jurisdiction, and that the purpose of such statutes is to cause such medals to be bestowed upon the members, whether regular or volunteer, and whether permanent or temporary, of the life-saving crews; and that the terms "succoring the ship-wrecked" and "saving persons from drowning," employed in section 12, act approved June 18, 1878, authorizing the bestowal of life-saving medals of the second class, were intended to embrace only those persons who were suffering from the perils of the sea, either by actual shipwreck or from being upon or connected with any vessel in distress: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of the acts relating to life-saving stations and the Life-Saving Service approved June 20, 1874, June 18, 1878, and May 4, 1882, as provided for the award of life-saving medals shall be construed so as to empower the Secretary of the Treasury to bestow such medals upon persons from drowning in the waters over which the United States has jurisdiction, whether the said persons making such exertions were or were not members of a life-saving crew, or whether or not such exertions were or were not members of a life-saving station.

The report (by Mr. WANGER) is as follows:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 234) construing the acts of Congress in relation to the award of life-saving medals, report in favor of the passage of the same without amend ment.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury respecting the subject-matter of the bill is printed in Senate Report No. 600. The Secretary suggested the insertion of the word "hereafter" after "persons," in line 9, but the Senate did not insert it, and your committee think it should not be inserted.

There have been many acts of great heroism in saving the lives of persons by others than members of the Life-Saving Service, and they merit recognition as well although performed since the opinion of the Attorney-General of January 30, 1895, as if performed before, or as if performed after the pending bill has become a law in case it is enacted.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, it was passed.

On motion of Mr. WANGER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed with the call of committees

The Committee on Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress was called.

Mr. CORLISS. I would ask unanimous consent that that committee be passed over without prejudice for the present.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask that the other committees be called.

The Committee on Printing was called.

UNLAWFUL USE OF FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the committee to call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 9601) to amend an act entitled "An act providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents," approved January 12, 1895.

The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 85 of the act aforesaid be amended so the section may read as follows, to wit:

"Sec. 85. The Vice-President, Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives may send and receive through the mail free all public documents printed by order of Congress; and the name of the Vice-President, Senator, Representative, Delegate, Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House shall be written thereon, with the proper designation of the office he holds; and the provisions of this section shall apply to each of the persons named therein until the 1st day of December following the expiration of their respective terms of office, except in the case of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, whose franking privilege shall expire upon the qualification of their successors in office. The Vice-President, Members, and Members-elect of and Delegates and Delegates-elect to Congress shall have the privilege of sending free through the mails, and under their frank, any mail matter to any Government official or to any person, correspondence, not exceeding 1 ounce in weight, upon official or departmental business: Provided, That if any person shall make use of any franked envelope to avoid the payment of postage on his private letter, package, or other mail matter, or shall insert in such envelope printed or written matter not entitled to be transmitted free of postage, or shall use the frank of another without special written authority therefor, to secure the free transmission of books or public documents, the person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to a fine of $300, to be prosecuted in any court of competent jurisdiction."

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask to have the report accompanying

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask to have the report accompanying the bill read.

The report (by Mr. RICHARDSON) was read, as follows:

The report (by Mr. Kichardson) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9601) to smend an act entitled "An act providing for the public printing and binding, and the distribution of public documents," approved January 12, 1895, have had the same under consideration and submit the following report:

This provision of the act above referred to was incorporated in the public printing bill by an amendment offered while the bill was pending before the House, and was agreed to without full discussion and not after due investigation of the subject. A penalty for the abuse of the franking privilege of members was probably inadvertently left out. The necessity for the adoption of some measure of this character is so apparent that it seems unnecessary for your committee to dwell at any length upon these sufficient reasons. That the frank of members is indiscriminately used now by a great many people no person will deny. The Post-Office Department is unable to prevent this.

The bill is recommended by the Post-Office Department, and your committee would respectfully recommend that it do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. CANNON. Wherein does this bill change existing law, I would ask the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. RICHARDSON. This bill was introduced by the gentleman from California [Mr. Loud], and I yield to him for the pur-man writing to me a letter acknowledging the receipt of a bound copy of the statutes. He rather facetiously, in his letter, stated that he would like to get the statutes, but would much prefer to have them sent direct, rather than through a law publishing firm in San Francisco, because, of course, I would not charge him anything for them, while those that were sent to him came at a charge of $3.50.

Again, I have a return registered receipt—I have received many Again, I have a return registered receipt—I have received many of them during the last year—but here is a return registered receipt, for instance, received from the town of Delano, in my own State. I am assumed to have sent a package to this gentleman, and this is the return receipt. I never sent any package of that kind to the gentleman, neither do I know him.

Mr. CANNON. That is a registered package, is it?

Mr. LOUD. A registered package.

Mr. CANNON. That is a registered package, is it?

Mr. LOUD. A registered package.

Mr. CANNON. Well, postage was paid on that, was it not?

Mr. LOUD. No, it was not; and it is not necessary. You can register anything that is frankable.

Mr. CANNON. Do you mean you can register anything that is frankable without the payment of postage?

Mr. LOUD. Ob certainly: you can register a sack. I have

Mr. LOUD. Oh, certainly; you can register a sack. I have done it, and probably the gentleman has done it himself. You can register a sack of books by the payment of 8 cents.

Mr. CANNON. Let me ask the gentleman further—I am quite in harmony with a penalty for the improper use of the frank—does this interfere with the right of a Representative or Senator to anthorize another to use his frank?

does this interfere with the right of a Representative or Senator to authorize another to use his frank?

Mr. LOUD. It does not. This simply provides a penalty for the use of the frank except by consent of a member.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I only want to say a word. This bill is an amendment to the printing bill. It will be recalled by gentlemen who were here in the Fifty-third Congress, when the printing bill passed, that this provision, giving the franking privilege to members, was not in the bill. It is no part of the framework of that bill, but this provision, allowing the franking privilege to members in a modified form, was put into the bill on the floor as an amendment by a gentleman then on the floor of the House. It was not carefully prepared, as I have stated, and for that reason, possibly, this amendment is more necessary.

I think the amendment should be adopted.

Mr. LACEY. I wish to ask the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] two questions.

Loud] two questions.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I wish to ask the gentleman if he has included a clause enlarging the penitentiary? [Laughter.]

Mr. LACEY. I wish to ask the gentleman from California whether this interferes with the transmission of seeds?

Mr. LOUD. It does not interfere. I will say to the gentleman in perfect good faith that this simply provides a penalty for the use of a member's frank without his authority.

Mr. LACEY. It seems to go a little further.

Mr. RICHARDSON. We simply repeat the law as it now exists; that is all.

Mr. LACEY. Then another question. You say the frank shall be written. Does that preclude the use of a stamp?

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is the present language, but it is construed to mean that it may be written by another, with the authority of the member. Mr. LACEY. The que Mr. LACEY. The question is, whether a stamp can be used.

Mr. FOOTE. If a member should inadvertently send some matter through the mails that he thought was frankable, if it should turn out that it was not frankable, he would be liable to a fine of $300.

Mr. LOUD. I assume that is so.

Mr. RICHARDSON. A member is authorized now to frank letters that do not exceed an ounce in weight, if they are on official business. Now, suppose the gentleman was to send a letter that exceeded an ounce in weight, or suppose he should make a mistake and put into the letter correspondence which did not relate to official business. He would be subject to a penalty now. Therefore the argument fails, it seems to me.

Mr. FOOTE. Is there a penalty to-day on the matter franked by a member? Mr. RICHARDSON. There is a penalty for any violation of the postal laws.

Mr. FOOTE. For everybody but members, is it not?
Mr. LOUD. For everyone except members.
Mr. FOOTE. This extends it to members themselves, a most man from California [Mr. Loud], and I yield to him for the purpose of making an explanation.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I will say in answer to the question of the gentleman from Illinois that this bill simply provides a penalty, not now provided in the law, for the unlawful use of a frank of a member of Congress—without his permission.

I want to say to the members present that probably they have discovered before now that the frank of members is being indiscriminately used by a great many people. It was brought to my attention very forcibly in the late campaign by a gentle-

Mr. RICHARDSON. No. We do not change it in that respect, as I understand it

Mr. BOUTELLE. It must be a change, if there is no such thing in the law and you propose to make such a thing.

Mr. LOUD. It provides a penalty on all frankable matter.

Mr. FOOTE. It says "any person."

Mr. FOOTE. It says "any person."
Mr. RICHARDSON. If members willfully violate the law, why should they not be liable?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I am not discussing that question. I only want it understood that you are making a change. It has been supposed up to this time that a member of Congress was trustworthy in regard to the use of these envelopes.

A MEMBER. I am glad to hear that. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. That seems to be a matter of ridicule with some gentlemen. I allow every man to place his own estimate upon himself and his trustworthiness. [Laughter.] Down in my part of the country the people are inclined to trust me with the use of a 2-cent envelope. But this proposition makes a radical change. I do not know whether it is an undesirable change or not, but it has a three-hundred-dollar penalty for the use of an envelope which we are now authorized to employ in the transmission of replies to correspondence in regard to public business; and it may be just as well that members who are supplied by law, by Congress, with the assistance of clerks, to understand if one of their assistants should put an unmailable, unfrankable paper in one of these envelopes they would be subject to a fine of $300.

Mr. BRODERICK. The clerk, or member?

Mr. BOUTELLE. The clerk, or member, or any other person.

Mr. LOUD. There is no doubt but what the violation of the law would have to be willful in order to convict the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do not know. Mr. DOCKERY. But does not the law say that the penalty is to be imposed where the use of the envelope is made to avoid the payment of postage on private matter?

Mr. BOUTELLE. There are a great many cases where the line is very difficult to draw, and my judgment would be that it would be a great deal better for an occasional slip of that kind to be made, with the trivial loss of 2 cents, than it would be to run a quorum of the members of the House of Representatives into jail some time when we might need them on the floor. [Laughter.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Not if they were all trustworthy like the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BARRETT. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. BOUTELLE. You might have to spend more in having the Sergeant-at-Arms bring the members into the House than the loss on postage.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I will not yield the floor at the present. I want the House to understand just what they are doing in this matter. There is no doubt but what there is being sent through the mails to-day tons of matter where the frank of a member is used without his knowledge or consent. Now, it seems plain to any person, I think, that that evil ought to be remedied. There is no other way to remedy it except by providing a penalty. I have been in consultation with the Post-Office Department for a long time about this matter. They say there is no law providing a penalty, that Congress has not seen fit to take any action in this matter, and if they were to begin to prosecute for the wrongful use of the frank of a member, they can not punish the guilty party. Hence the Post-Office Department has continued to take no cognizance of it whatever. I do not assume that this bill would trench on the individual privileges of any member of this House. I think the act, by the reading of this bill, must be willful. I do not think there is any doubt about that. And, so far as I am concerned, I would be willing to stand a penalty if I willfully committed a wrongful act; and I think the gentleman from Maine What amendment does the gentleman from Massawould, too. What amendment does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire to offer? I retain the floor.

Mr. EVANS. I want to offer an amendment which, it seems to me, will obviate the trouble suggested by the gentleman's remarks.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Kentucky to offer an amendment?

Mr. LOUD. I yield for the reading of it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. EVANS. The amendment which I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, would be, in line 24, on page 2, to insert after the word "person" the words "other than one entitled to the franking privilege: "so that it will read in such a way as to exclude a memprivilege;" so that it will read in such a way as to exclude a member of Congress, for example, from the provisions of the section, and make it apply to a person using his frank entirely unauthorized by him; and then it seems to me it would meet the objection entirely.

Mr. LOUD. I can not hear the gentleman. [After a pause.]
I am willing to accept that amendment.
Mr. DOCKERY. I hope the gentleman in charge of the bill will not accept that amendment. By implication that gives members of Congress clearly the right to violate the law.

Mr. LOUD. I think it would be so by implication.

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not think members want to be put in any such attitude as that.

Mr. LOUD. I do not think the House, on proper second thought, would want to put itself in the position of exemption from the

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would not like to vote on a provision that exempted me from the law.

Mr. DOČKERY. There has been no extension of the franking privilege by the bill?

Mr. LOUD. Not at all. This bill cuts off some of the franking privilege.

Mr. DOCKERY. I would say to the gentleman that I regret that the Postmaster of the House, the Clerk, and the Sergeant-at-Arms are not included in this provision, because the House appropriates a sum of money for that purpose every year.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be very glad to know what is being said. If gentlemen would take their seats, most of them, and cease conversation, it might be possible to understand what is going on.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Will the gentleman from California let me ask him a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from California yield to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky? Mr. LOUD. I believe I will not, on second thought. I yield to Mr. Holder and the sent leman from Pennsylvania for a question.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I understand that the gentleman's complaint against the abuse of the present privilege is that people use the franks of Congressmen without authority. Is that it?

Mr. LOUD. That is it.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. There is no complaint, then, that any Member of the House, or any Delegate, has ever abused the privilege granted to him by the legislation of last Congress?

Mr. LOUD. Not that I have heard of.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Then why is it necessary to include in this bill restrictions and penalties on ourselves? If clerks or others are abusing the privilege, it may be well enough to prowide a penalty for their acts, but I can not see any reason why we should not uphold the dignity of our office as members of Congress.

Mr. LOUD. Why should we exempt ourselves?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Why should we put ourselves in the penal class unless from some sense of wrongdoing?

Mr. WASHINGTON. Any member who violates the law will put himself in the penal class.

Mr. LOUD. 1 yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Can-

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer an amend-ment striking out from lines 23 and 23 the words "not exceeding ounce in weight." I desire to take the sense of the House on that amendment.

Mr. LOUD. I will say to the gentleman that I would greatly prefer that he should bring that proposition before the House in some other manner. It is an extension of the franking privilege which perhaps ought to be considered by the House, but, consulting my own wishes, I do not think that under the conditions which Mr. CANNON. I hope the gentleman will allow the House to express its sense upon the amendment.

Mr. LOUD. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not press the amendment at this time.

Mr. CANNON. I can offer it only in the event that the pre-vious question is voted down, and I hope the gentleman from California will not require me to make that test with him.

Mr. LOUD. I earnestly hope, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Illinois will not press that amendment upon this measure. If we want to extend the franking privilege, let us do it in another

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to ask the gentleman having this bill in charge if it is his intention, as evidenced by his statements to the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Kentucky, to move the previous question upon this bill without allowing amendments to be

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is hardly a parliamentary inquiry, but rather an inquiry to be addressed to the gentleman from California. Does the gentleman from California ask for the previous question?

Mr. LOUD. I will say, Mr. Speaker, that that is my intention.

I yield now to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Perkins], unless the gentleman from Massachusetts desires to propound some question.

Mr. PARDERES.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I do desire to ask a question. I would like to ask the gentleman whether it is his intention to move the previous question on this bill without affording to the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Kentucky an opportunity to offer the amendments which they have already indicated. indicated.

Mr. LOUD. I will say to the gentleman that that is my intention

Mr. BARRETT. Then, Mr. Speaker, I trust that the House will vote down the demand for the previous question.

Mr. LOUD. They have that privilege, of course. I yield now to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, the provisions of this bill change existing law in only two particulars. In the first place, a limitation is placed upon the right of the Secretary of the Senate and of the Clerk of the House of Representatives to use the franking privilege: that is, the right is not extended to them after the expiration. the Clerk of the House of Representatives to use the franking privilege; that is, the right is not extended to them after the expiration of their terms of office. The only other change is contained in the provise in the end of the bill which provides that any person who shall use the franking privilege without authority, or in a manner violative of the law, shall be subject to the specified penalty. At the present time there is no penalty upon the statute books for the violation by anybody of this privilege which is extended by law to members of Congress. Anyone, anywhere, can use the frank of a member and there is no penalty for it. The provision of this bill is intended not to reflect upon members of Congress, but to prevent the fraudulent use of franks by those who are not entitled to use them. I can see no objection to the qualifi-Congress, but to prevent the fraudulent use of franks by those who are not entitled to use them. I can see no objection to the qualification of this proviso in line 26 by inserting before the word 'shall' the word 'willfully;" but certainly there ought to be some penalty for the fraudulent use of the franking privilege as extended to members of Congress by law. That can now be done promiscuously, and no penalty attaches. The provision of this bill is intended to stop that abuse, or subject those who perpetrate it to the same penalty which now applies in the case of departmental business.

Mr. LACEY. I notice in lines 26 and 27 the words "or shall insert in such envelope printed or written matter not entitled to be transmitted free of postage," etc. Now, suppose a member receives a letter in regard to a pension matter, and after looking it receives a letter in regard to a pension matter, and after looking it up answers the inquiry, and in doing so adds the compliments of the season, or, perhaps, sends a message of some private character to one of his friends. In such a case the member would be, as I understand, subject to a penalty of $300.

Mr. PERKINS. I do not so understand. I suppose any gentleman would be permitted, in such a case, without violating his privilege, to write a courteous letter.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Not under this bill.

Mr. LOUD. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that, if the amendment will obviate objection on the part of any members, I will assent to inserting the word "willfully "after the word "shall"

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California, as the Chair understands, moves to amend by inserting after the word "shall," in line 26, the word "willfully."

Mr. TRACEY. If there is any merit in that amendment, the word "willfully" should also be inserted after the word "shall" in line 24. It is just as necessary in the one case as in the other.

Mr. LOUD. I assent to the amendment simply for the purpose of relieving the sensitive feelings of some members of Congress.

Line 24 does not refer to members of Congress.

Mr. TRACEY. It says "any person." I assume it might include a member of Congress.

Mr. LOUD. I assume that the bill would be construed as implying the term "willfully." I do not think there is any necessity for the amendment.

Mr. TRACEY. If the amendment be inserted in line 26, it certainly ought to be inserted also in line 24.

Mr. LOUD. I do not think so.

Mr. TRACEY. The effect is precisely the same in each case.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LOUD. Yes. sir.

Mr. LOUD. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Would not the gentleman consent to add, after the word "Congress," in the twentieth line of page 2, the words "Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House?" These officers have now no franking privilege at all, except in reference to books. It would seem proper to give them the same privilege that is intended to be conferred in the first section.

Mr. LOUD. I hope the gentleman will not press that amendment now, because this bill does not seek to extend the franking privilege. If the House wants to consider that question, I prefer it should be taken up in another manner.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. But at the present time the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Control of the House and the Secretary of the House and the Secretary of t of the House and the Secretary of the Senate have to pay their own postage on official correspondence. They have not been included in previous legislation on this subject at all. It would seem to be proper that they should be covered by this bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. Allow me to suggest that the law now makes an appropriation for postage of $100 each year to the Postmaster of the House, $300 to the Clerk of the House, and $200 to the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. So do members receive an appro-

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. So do members receive an appropriation for postage.

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I had hoped that when this question came up these officers would be included among those entitled to the benefit of the franking privilege.

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly, they ought to be.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I will not press the amendment now, however, if the gentleman from California objects to it.

Mr. LOUD. I see no objection to the proposition or its merits.

But to be frank with the gentleman, there is this objection: If the

But to be frank with the gentleman, there is this objection: If the door be opened in one direction he can readily see that there may be no end to amendments of this sort. I should prefer, therefore, that any measures for the extension of the franking privilege should be dealt with in another manner than on this bill

Mr. DOCKERY. Allowme a suggestion in this connection. It is not my purpose to offer any amendment, because I can see that the offering of one amendment may lead to the offering of others, and thus perhaps embarrass this bill. But if there were submitted to the House a measure to which the amendment would be proper, should offer an amendment to include among those entitled to the franking privilege the Clerk, the Sergeant-at-Arms, and the Postmaster of the House. I believe that money would be saved to the Government by such a provision. In the current legislative appropriation bill we have appropriated for postage on official letters $300 for the Clerk, $100 for the Postmaster, and $200 for the Sergeant-at-Arms.

A MEMBER. And those officers use the money, do they not? Mr. DOCKERY. I have no doubt they do. Still, I think that by granting them the franking privilege the Government would save money

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I should prefer to offer the amendment I have indicated, if the gentleman from California will allow it to be offered.

Mr. LOUD. If the gentleman can get unanimous consent for his amendment, I will not object to its insertion.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. The proposition is simply to permit the Clerk of the House, the Doorkeeper, the Sergeant-at-Arms, and the Postmaster to have the same privilege now accorded to members in reference to the franking of public documents.

Mr. HULL. Have they not already a fund provided for postage?
Mr. WILLIAMA. STONE. Precisely the same as we have, but that does not cover the expense. I ask unanimous consent to offer that amendment.

Mr. BARRETT. I will certainly object if it contemplates only a single amendment-

Mr. DOCKERY. I will object if it contemplates this privilege in addition to the postage already authorized. My understanding was that this was to be in lieu of that, and would in the end be a saving of expense. In other words, that while the franking privilege was extended, it would result in cutting off the allowance for postage hereafter.

Mr. LOUD. Your committee will have the control of that.
Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. If we are going to do this at all, we must do it properly, and extend this privilege where it is so much needed, in the manner I have suggested, all at once.
Mr. PERKINS. What is the gentleman's amendment?
Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. In general terms, to extend the franking privilege to the Clerk of the House, Doorkeeper, Sergeant-at-Arms, and the Postmaster.

Mr. BARRETT. I object to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania unless all others are permitted to offer amendments.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I have not stated all of my proposition yet, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman objects to a part of it.

[Laughter.]
Mr. BARRETT. I object unless all other members are granted the right to offer amendments.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I think I shall have to call for the previous question.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Then I hope the demand will be voted down.

Mr. BARRETT. Pending that demand, Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion.

The SPEAKER. What motion does the gentleman submit?

Mr. BARRETT. A motion to recommit the bill.

I move to recommit this bill to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads with instructions not to report the bill again except with the words "not exceeding 1 ounce in weight," in lines 22 and 23, stricken out, and the words "not entitled to the franking privilege under this act" be first inserted after the word "person," in line 24. This motion embraces the amendments offered by the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Will you include my amendment also among them?

Mr. BROMWELL. The gentleman makes his motion to recommit this to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. It should be the Committee on Printing.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am perfectly willing, I will say to the gentleman, that it shall go to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. It ought to go to a committee having jurisdiction of the matter if it is to be recommitted at all.

Mr. BARRETT. I will change my motion and move that it be recommitted to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. LOUD. How can that motion be submitted now?

Mr. DOCKERY. It can be done after the previous question has been ordered, under the rule.

The SPEAKER. After the demand for the previous question on the passage. It could not be done until after the bill had been passed to its engrossment.

The first question is on the motion for the previous question. Does the gentleman from California make his demand up to the engrossment, or to the passage of the bill?

Mr. LOUD. On the bill to its passage.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the previous question be ordered?

The question was taken; and on a division there were-ayes 37,

Mr. RICHARDSON. I make the point of order that no quorum has voted; but pending that, I will withdraw the point and the bill from consideration.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I rise to a point of order.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. BOUTELLE. Can the gentleman from

Can the gentleman from Tennessee with-

Mr. BOUTELLE. Can the gentenant from the draw the bill now, at this stage?

Mr. DOCKERY. There has been no vote upon it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And no amendment adopted.

The SPEAKER. There has been no vote or amendment, as the Chair is informed. The question would arise whether, the committee having presented the bill, or directed it to be presented, it can be withdrawn in this way.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Is the bill not now in the possession of the House to determine whether it will order the previous question and cut off all debate, or go on debating it? We seem to have a sort of clutch on it, one way or the other. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House, a bill may be

But the Chair would like to understand exactly the motion and the condition of the bill. Was the amendment proposed by the gentleman from California agreed to?

Mr. LOUD. Amendments were accepted.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But there was no vote. They were not submitted to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Tennessee on the question of the right to withdraw a bill which has been presented by a committee.

Mr. BARRETT. Pending that decision, I desire to submit to the Chair that I have already, under the rule, a motion pending for a recommittal with instructions, and until that motion is discreted of it is not in order to withdraw the bill from the House.

or a recommittal with instructions, and until that motion is disposed of it is not in order to withdraw the bill from the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That motion would not be in order until after the previous question.

The SPEAKER. That motion could not be voted upon until the bill had passed to engrossment.

Mr. BARRETT. The rule says that "pending the motion for the previous question upon the final passage it shall be in order for the Speaker to entertain and submit a motion to recommit."

A motion has been made and was pending for the previous questions. A motion has been made and was pending for the previous ques-

The SPEAKER. But it is the previous question on the passage which is referred to.

Mr. BARRETT. The gentleman from California [Mr. Loud]

which is referred to.

Mr. BARRETT. The gentleman from California [Mr. Loud] expressly stated that he moved the previous question up to and including the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Precisely. A motion can be made for the previous question upon the engrossment and third reading of a bill, or it can be double and made on the engrossment and third reading if the bill and its passage, but the place where the motion to reof the bill and its passage; but the place where the motion to re-commit comes in is after the bill has passed to its engrossment and third reading, and when the question of its passage is pending.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, the rule is very explicit—

The SPEAKER. The rule seems to the Chair to be explicit, and the practice of the House agrees with the understanding which the Chair is trying to present.

Mr. BARRETT. Then, Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit this proposition: That where a rule of the House states a case as clearly as it is possible for the English language to express it, members who may not be used to the practice of the House are entitled to have the rules enforced as they are printed. This rule is as clear as the English language can make it. It says that pending the motion for the previous question on the final passage it shall be in order for the Speaker to entertain a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has endeavored to explain to the The SPEAKER. The Chair has endeavored to explain to the gentleman—probably it is the fault of the Chair in not being able to explain it clearly—but the proposition is that it is the motion for the previous question upon the final passage that is spoken of as pending, and during the pendency or after the passage of which a motion to commit may be submitted. Now, the rule of the House permits a double motion, which is to move the previous question on the engrossment to the passage, so that when under the operation of that double motion, or a motion double in its effect, a motion to recommit is presented it must wait until the effect, a motion to recommit is presented, it must wait until the bill has passed to be engrossed before it can become pending, Such has always been the ruling in the House, and such, as it seems to the Chair, is the plain meaning of the rule.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair allow me for a

Mr. BOUTELLE. One moment. Does that involve a condition of things in which a gentleman, by asking for the previous question, including the engrossment and up to the passage, would deprive members of the privilege of moving to recommit?

The SPEAKER. Not at all.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Then the Chair understands that the motion must still be acted upon—

The SPEAKER. It is simply a question as to when the motion to recommit becomes effective in the proceedings.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But the point is that the previous question, as the question is now, does not include the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill could be passed in this way: First, by a motion for the previous question upon the engrossment of the bill, and then the previous question would exhaust itself, and the bill, and then the previous question would exhaust itself, and the question might become a subject of discussion if the previous question were not renewed on the passage; and it is at that time that the motion to recommit is admissible under our rules, upon the theory that the House, having amended the bill, and having ordered it to be engrossed, and having presumably examined the engrossed copy, is not satisfied with the amendments which have been made in the bill, and therefore wants to recommit it, and then the House has a last chance to send it to a committee. According to our system, the bill is up. The House has the right to send it to a committee or a right to amend it. It chooses to amend it. Having amended it, and having had it engrossed, and having examined it, the House comes to the conclusion that it is not satisfied with the bill, and therefore, by its rules, gives itself naving examined it, the House comes to the conclusion that it is not satisfied with the bill, and therefore, by its rules, gives itself the right to send it again to a committee, to enable them to make such changes as may make it more acceptable to the House.

Now, where the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT] is misled is in the joining together, by the rule of the House, of the two motions for the previous question—the one on the motion that the bill be engrossed, and the other on the motion for the passage.

Now, that some to the Chair to be clear.

Now, that seems to the Chair to be clear.
Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair allow me to weary him for one moment?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BARRETT. The point I make is in a different line. Now, the question is whether or not a motion for the previous question is pending after it has already been adopted. I contend that a question is pending in this House before it is voted upon, and that after it has been voted upon it is no longer pending. I think any gentleman in this House or in the chair will agree to that proposition. Then the only time to make the motion to recommit, under the rule which says it may be made "pending" the motion for the previous question, is to make it before the motion for the previous question is voted on. It is only voted on once, and the time I suggest is the only time the motion can be made "pending" the motion for the previous question.

Now, the rule says that while a motion for the previous question is pending on the final passage of the bill, then a motion to recommit may be made. The Chair says that only after the pre-vious question is ordered—and therefore the motion for it is no longer pending—a motion to recommit may be made on the final passage, after the bill has been engrossed.

I claim that the rule clearly states that either before or after the previous question is ordered—and in this proceeding it is only voted on once—the motion to recommit may be made and must be submitted.

I contend that if this rule means anything it means that a I contend that if this rule means anything it means that a motion to recommit may be made when the previous question is pending—the previous question that is voted on—and it certainly is not pending after it has been adopted. When I offered my motion to recommit the bill, it was pending. The Chair says that after the motion for the previous question has been adopted—it certainly is not then pending—then it is in order to move to recommit. I concede that. But the rule says that it shall be in order both while the previous question is pending and after it is adopted. This practice deprives the House of its right to vote on recommittal pending the previous question. recommittal pending the previous question.

The SPEAKER. That refers to the principal motion, for the previous question on the final passage of the bill.

Mr. BARRETT. It was for the passage of the bill that the gentleman from California asked the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The motion to recommit cannot come in until after the bill has been engrossed.

Mr. BARRETT. I ask the Chair, in order that I may understand this matter, and I know many members desire to understand it, whether or not when the gentleman from California moves the previous question on the final passage of this bill that that motion previous question on the final passage of this bill that that motion is pending after it has been adopted?

The SPEAKER. It is pending but as to two places. The motion for the engrossment and the motion for the final passage; and under the practice of the House, for the reasons which the Chair has given, the motion to recommit comes in before the motion for passage and after engrossment.

Mr. BARRETT. I appreciate the point made by the Chair, and can see where the practice may have arisen; but I respectfully contend that a motion that may be made pending any certain motion must be made before that motion is adopted, for after it is adopted it is no longer pending. I do not deny the practice. I affirm that the practice is in violation of the plain reading of the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will see that the original rule did not allow two motions for the previous question to be made at the same time, and when the change was made it was made pending the custom already established, and that attached itself to the ing the custom already established, and that attached itself to the practice of the House, as the Chair has described; and such has been the practice of the House.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is the history of it.

The SPEAKER. That has been the history of it.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not contend but that it may have been the practice of the House, but I do most certainly say that, so far as my knowledge of interpretation of the English language. guage is concerned, there can only be one interpretation of the English language is concerned, there can only be one interpretation put upon this rule, and that is that the motion to recommit can be made while the previous question is pending. The language of the rule, if explicit, is final, and when adopted abrogated all previous customs inconsistent with it. That is the point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know whether the interpretation of the English language of the rule, if explicit, and the second of the explicit of the English language is concerned, there is a supplied to the explicit of the English language is concerned, there is a supplied to the explicit of the English language is concerned, there is a supplied to the explicit of the English language is concerned, there is a supplied to the explicit of the English language is concerned, there is a supplied to the English language is concerned, there is a supplied to the English language is concerned, the English language is concerned in the English language is concerned in pretation can be properly placed there or not; but the House has

Mr. LOUD. I move that the House do now adjourn.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 878) to reduce the cases in which the penalty of death may be inflicted;

INSURANCE CLAIMS.

Mr. BRICE. I present a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, together with one from the Auditor for the War Department, transmitting a list of claims allowed by the Second Comptroller and Acting Second Comptroller, in favor of sundry insurance companies, for amounts paid for the loss of steamboats, which was settled for under the act of March 3, 1849. I move that the communications be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.
The motion was agreed to.

ment, asked that it be discharged from the further consideration of the petitions, and that they be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds; which was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by Mr. WALTHALL on the 6th instant, intended to be proposed to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, reported it without amendment, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

JOHN KEEFE.

Mr. TELLER. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4538) for the relief of John Keefe, to report it favorably, and submit a written report thereon. I will say that this bill involves a little matter of but $220 to pay

I will say that this bill involves a little matter of but $220 to pay a laborer in Syracuse, N. Y., and that it has the approval of the Treasury Department. I therefore ask that it may be considered at this time and put on its passage.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to John Keefe, of Syracuse, N. Y., the sum of $220, in full compensation for his services as engineer in the United States court-house and post-office building in Syracuse, N. Y., for the months of July and August, 1888, and from June 1 to August 17, 1889.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading read the third time and passed.

to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

USE OF THE LIBRARY BUILDING.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress to report back the resolution which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HILL in the chair). The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the building providing additional accommodations for the Library of Congress shall not be used or occupied, nor any part thereof, for any purpose other than that legitimately connected with the aforesaid Library of Congress.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the committee to ask immediate consideration of the resolution, to which I think there will be no objection.

Mr. TELLER. Let it be read. The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ALLEN. Let it be again read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be again read.

The Secretary read the resolution.

Mr. HALE. I wish the Senator who has reported the resolution would state to the Senate just what is meant to be covered by it. If it is simply intended to prohibit any inauguration ball or ceremonies of that kind in the new Library building, that is one thing, and perhaps nobody would object to it; but if there are spaces in the building which need not be devoted to the Library for years to come, I do not know of any reason why they may not be utilized in some way. I have seen reports in some of the newspapers that some of the rooms were intended to be occupied for what perhaps would not be strictly Library purposes, some scientific or semi-scientific purposes, and, for one, I do not see, considering that there is a great deal of waste space in the building, any objec-tion to that. I should like the Senator to explain, before I give consent that the resolution be considered to-day, just what he intends by the resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, the resolution was very carefully considered by the full committee, and has been before the committee for some time, and there has been no opinion expressed in opposition to it. I will say that it is intended to exclude everything which is not pertinent to the Library itself. The Library perhaps is larger than will be needed for the present for the amount of books which we now have, but it is not any larger than will be necessary in years to come for the Library alone. If we are to begin by letting in one Department and then another, and they are apt to make applications from all sources for accommodation in the new Library, I think we shall find ourselves in some trouble.

I understand that the Geographical Society desire that room shall be assigned them. It has also been proposed that the Com-mittee on Education and Labor shall have a place in the Library building, and still further that a part of the National Museum shall be placed there, as that might obviate the building of additional accommodations for that institution.

I hope, therefore, that the resolution will be allowed to pass, and yet if the Senator from Maine desires to have it lie upon the and yet it he sender from maine desires to have to be upon the table, I shall not object.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I think the resolution had better The Library building is a most magnificent one. It is a credit to the designers, to the officers who had its construction in hand, to the Congress which has furnished the money which has built it, and to the country; but it has immense space divided and partitioned into different rooms that for a few years to come may be occupied for some useful purpose, and not in the slightest degree interfere with the Library; occupied for purposes where a removal may be made at any time; occupied where it will be no reproach to the Librarian or to the Library for it to be so occupied. I should like that the resolution stand over for the present until Senators can look into and examine it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the resolution will go over.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the Senator from Georgia to yield to me for a moment

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BACON. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. I should feel greatly obliged for unanimous consent of the Senate to enable me to call up House bill 8676. It is an exigent and meritorious bill for the relief of a town in Arizona.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The title of the bill referred to by the Senator from Minnesota will be read for information, subject to objection.

ject to objection.

The Secretary read the bill (H. R. 8676) to enable the town of Flagstaff, in the Territory of Arizona, to issue bonds to construct a water system.

Mr. ALLEN. I supposed the bill was simply being read for information. I did not know that consent had been given to take

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will not object. Mr. ALLEN. I want to ask the Senator from Minnesota what I want to ask the Senator from Minnesota what is the necessity for Congress passing such a bill? Can not that authority be given by the Territorial legislature?

Mr. DAVIS. Not under the Territorial charter.

Mr. ALLEN. Does not the enabling act authorize the Terri tory to do so?

Mr. DAVIS. It does not. They could not negotiate a bond without the passage of this bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

USE OF MONEY IN ELECTIONS.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, on the 11th of January I obtained permission to have printed as Miscellaneous Document No. 55 a statement of the vote at the recent Presidential election. statement of the vote at the recent Presidential election. My attention has been called to two subheadings which I think ought to be corrected. Where the subheading "Successes of Mark Hanna" is printed, I wish that stricken out and the subhead "Contested States" inserted in lieu thereof. The next subheading, "Failures of Mark Hanna," I ask to have stricken out and instead that the words "States not carried by the Republican party" be inserted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The changes asked for by the Senator from Nebraska will be made, in the absence of objection. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I regret exceedingly the lateness of the hour and the circumstances under which I am now called upon to address the Senate on this very important question. I of the hour and the circumstances under which I am now called upon to address the Senate on this very important question. I should ask the further indulgence of the Senate for a postponement until some other time but that I fear the pressing business of the Senate might not, in that case, give me the opportunity to present certain views which I am anxious that I may have the opportunity to present to this body.

In December I introduced a concurrent resolution, which has been referred to the Committee on the Indicious I will read it.

been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I will read it:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the question of the recognition by this Government of any people as a free and independent nation is one exclusively for the determination of Congress in its capacity as the lawmaking power;

Resolved further, That this prerogative of sovereign power does not appertain to the executive department of the Government, except in so far as the President is, under the Constitution, by the exercise of the veto, made a part of the lawmaking power of the Government.

The resolution being before the Committee on the Judiciary, it is not competent for me to call it up, and I therefore avail myself of the opportunity presented by the pendency of the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to address myself to the general subject, which is also embraced in the first section of his joint resolution, which I ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as re-

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the expediency of recognizing the independence of a foreign government belongs to Congress, and when Congress shall so determine, the Executive should act in harmony with the legislative department of the Government.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the general subject of the powers of the Executive and of Congress as the lawmaking power is raised as well by the first section of the joint resolution of the Senator from Texas as by the resolution offered by myself, and in the discussion I shall treat the subject generally, having more particular reference to the phraseology and direct provisions of the resolution offered by myself, which is now before the Committee on the

This, Mr. President, may be said to be a question which has not come before us incidentally. It is true that the question arises out of the pendency of the question of the recognition of Cuban independence, but it has been brought before us in a much more direct way than could possibly be accomplished by the simple pendency of that matter. The Committee on Foreign Relations, composed of Senators of experience and ability, men not only eminent in this body, but eminent as the foremost men of the nation, have reported to the Senate a resolution in which they affirm indirectly the power of Congress to deal with this subject. They have recommended the adoption of a resolution by which the independence of Cuba would be acknowledged by this Government, and thereby have affirmed that in their opinion it is competent for the law-making power by the adoption of a joint resolution to acknowledge such independence.

Immediately thereafter an officer of another department of the Government, the Secretary of State, publishes what we may accept as an authorized interview, in which he denies the power of Congress to take such action, denies its authority to pass upon the question whether or not a government shall be acknowledged as a free and independent government, and claims that under the Continuous contraction. stitution the exclusive power so to do rests with the Executive. In pursuance of the expression of that opinion, and in the same interview, he announces that if Congress should take such action it would be treated by the Executive as of no authority, and he particularly invites the attention of foreign nations to the fact that the executive department of this Government, as regards this question, acknowledges no such authority in the lawmaking department of the Government.

We have here, Mr. President, a direct, most undisguised issue; one which has been presented in such a manner that this department of the Government must either meet and assert its prerogative or by its silence must consent to the assertion that it has no ave or by its silence must consent to the assertion that it has no such prerogative. Therefore I say that this question has not been incidentally raised. It has been presented to us as the sharpest, the most distinct of issues. We must either meet it, or we must assent to the proposition that we are not entitled to exercise this prerogative; and when I say "we" I mean the lawmaking power of the Government. of the Government.

This question is to be decided by a consideration of what are the powers of these two great departments of this Government as conferred upon the several departments by the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. There has never before been a time in the history of this Government, during a period of more than one hundred years, since its foundation, when this question has been distinctly raised. There have been claims and assertions on the one side and on the other as to what were the rights of either of the departments, but there has never been an instance, so far as I know or have been able to ascertain-and if I am in error I shall be glad if some Senator who has had more experience will correct me—where the question has been distinctly raised between the legislative department, the lawmaking department of the Government, and the executive department as to which department has the right to exercise this great power. In the consideration of the question it is necessary that we should appeal to the grants of power found in the Constitution to each of these departments, and that we should endeavor to judge both by the letter and the spirit of the Constitution which of these departments. ments has a right to exercise this great power.

Mr. President, I submit that this is a very grave question; that it is a question of the highest importance; that it is a question the importance of which is not measured by the influence which it may have upon the further question of the independence of any foreign government, but that it is a question the importance of which is measured by the fact that it must have in its decision a large influence in determining the lines which divide the authority and the power of one great department of this Government from the power and authority of another department of the Government. Furthermore, it is a question the importance of which is measured not simply by the decision so far as it may affect the particular question of the right to recognize the independence of a government, but it goes further, for the reason that the principles which are involved and which will control this par-ticular question will also control very many more questions that closely concern the interests of the people of this country.

In considering the question as to where this power lies it is necessary to see what the Constitution has granted to the executive department. It is necessary that we should endeavor to see what was the design of the Constitution as to where the great sovereign powers should be vested, and that we should endeavor then to classify this particular power to see where it should lie.

Anyone who reads the Constitution must be impressed by the fact that the great central object in the formation of that instrufact that the great central object in the formation of that instru-ment was to make this a representative government, not simply a government representative in form, but a government which should be representative in fact, and a government which the people, through those whom they might elect as their lawmakers, should determine what should be the measures, what should be the policies, and what should be the laws of this country. In accordance with that design, all lawmaking power is committed to Congress, and the very first section of the first article in the Constitution, the very first line in the Constitution after the pre-amble is one which asserts that all legislative powers conferred amble, is one which asserts that all legislative powers conferred by that instrument are conferred upon a Congress of the United States to consist of a Senate and House of Representatives

This is not only a broad and a general grant, but it is an exclusive grant, and when we come to examine the powers conferred upon the Executive, we find no vestige, no scintilla of an inten-tion to confer upon the President any legislative power whatever except in so far as the veto power may make him a part of the lawmaking power of the Government. Thus it is that when a power is claimed for the executive department, and the question arises whether it is a power which belongs to the executive department or is a power which belongs to the legislative department, one infallible test is this: Will the effect of the exercise of that power by the executive department be to enable it to accomplish that which is equivalent to the creation of law? Will it be to make that law which was not law before? If it does, then it is in the nature of a lawmaking power, and the test will decide that it is not one to be exercised by the Executive, but that it must be it is not one to be exercised by the Executive, but that it must be exercised by the legislative department.

Mr. President, if we apply this test to the particular question (I shall endeavor to hurry through this part of what I have to say, because it is only necessary to speak of it in general terms) whether the executive department has the right and the power under the Constitution, the exclusive power, to acknowledge the independence of a country, and endeavor to ascertain whether or not the acknowledgment of the independence of a country has the effect to accomplish that which would be in the nature of the effect to accomplish that which would be in the nature of the creation of law, what do we find? What is the effect of the acknowledgment of the independence of a nation? One necessary effect of it is to make that law in this country which was not law before. One necessary effect of it is to make all the obligations which apply under international law to any independent nation the law of this country as to that nation.

If under this test such a recognition is in its nature and effect of

If under this test such a recognition is in its nature and effect a legislative act, even though not in the usual form of a statute, the power rests exclusively with Congress in its lawmaking capacity, and in the absence of express grant in the Constitution it can not possibly belong to the Executive.

Is, then, such a recognition an act legislative in its nature and effect? An act, whatever be its form or guise, is legislative in effect whenever it imposes binding obligations and imperative duties upon the community which did not theretofore exist. Whatever is commanded by competent authority becomes law, and any such command, operating upon a whole people and also upon the departments and officials of the government, is a public

The recognition of the independence of a people does impose upon the people and officials of this Government new obligations and new duties. It lays upon them commands to observe such new duties and obligations to the new nation, its people, and its officials, and forbids them to infringe on rights which did not theretofore exist, rights which are created by such recognition.

International law, although never enacted in statutory form by any congress or parliament, is a recognized code of law of binding authority, and is so recognized and administered by our courts. It guarantees certain rights and imposes reciprocal obligations between independent nations. So soon as the independence of a nation is recognized by this Government, the duty is imposed upon our people and upon our officials that they shall regard those rights and observe those obligations in and to the people and government of the new nation. As respects a people not an independent nation no such obligation of law rests upon us. But when, by legal authority, the independence of a people is recognized, the act of recognition instantly, without more, lays upon our people and upon our officials the command to observe these obligations. As regards the relations between the people and officials of this Government and those of the newly independent people, that is made law for us which was not theretofore law. If to lay these commands upon the people and officials of the Gov-ernment is in the nature of a legislative act, then the official act which necessarily operates to create such commands is not within the province of the Executive except in so far as it may be performed with the assent of Congress

Mr. President, in addition to the view which I have thus far suggested, in a still broader sense has such recognition the nature and effect of a legislative act.

The act of recognition, when legally done, makes the independence of the new nation the law of this country. The object of the recognition is to change the legal status in this country of the people whose independence as a nation is thus declared. so, what is the purpose and what is the effect of such recognition by this Government? The purpose and effect can not be to change the legal status of such people in the contemplation and laws of other governments. That would be an impossibility. It can not be only to extend the expression of sympathy to the people of the recognized government. It is not simply intermeddling bravado. Nor is it merely a defiance to the one and a message of encouragement to the other of two contending parties. On the contrary, by such recognition is intended, and in fact found, something more material, something more practical.

It is a declaration of law in this country, with all of its attendant consequences, that a new nation has come into existence and that in its relations with this Government and this people it has all of the attributes and all of the rights of sovereignty; that it has the right to enforce every duty of citizenship upon those owing it allegiance; that it may declare war and make peace; that it may raise and maintain armies and build and commission ships of war; that it may lay and collect duties on imports, and that it may make treaties with foreign nations recognizing its independence.

I repeat, Mr. President, that the recognition makes the independence of the new nation a part of the law of this land. It becomes law binding upon the citizen, the official, and the Government; law recognized and administered by our courts; law under which in our own courts title to property is vested and divested; law which can be made the test of alleged crime; law which no judge of our courts could wantonly and capriciously ignore and refuse to administer without subjecting himself to impeachment and removal from office.

The declaration of a simple fact as a fact can not accomplish such result. The mere declaration of a fact as such can not coerce the action of a whole people and command the judgments and determine the decrees of courts as to property and personal liberty and life. Only law can do this, and only Congress can by the exercise of this power of recognition of the independence of a nation declare this law. When the act of recognition is by the Executive, it derives its validity from the assent of Congress, actual or implied. Such recognition by the Executive, in an undisputed case, is entirely consistent with the implied assent of Congress, and entirely consistent with the recognized existence of the final or supreme constitutional power being in Congress.

Mr. GRAY. Would the Senator from Georgia object to an interruption?

Mr. BACON. Not in the least.
Mr. GRAY. I am very much interested in the argument the Senator is making, and it is new, so far as I know. I understand him to say that there can be a law which exists and is binding as a law directing conduct and controlling the action of officials and it is that exists by the implied consent of Congress.

citizens that exists by the implied consent of Congress

Mr. BACON. The proposition is this: International law is a part of the law of this land and will be administered by the courts of this country, both Federal and State, without any distinct legal enactment either by Congress or by any State government. When through legal action by proper authority a nation is recognized as an independent nation, all the rights which that nation has under international law are rights which under the law of the Federal Government, rights which under the law of State governments, can be enforced either in the courts of the Federal Government or of the States by reason of the fact that such independence has been acknowledged. That is the proposition, and, Mr. President, I did not suppose it would be questioned. If the learned Senator from Delaware does question it, while I have not the books here I can undertake to furnish him with authorities, both Federal and State, to the effect that international law is a law which, while it has never been enacted by the authorities of this country, is binding upon the courts, both Federal and State, and will be enforced in either of those jurisdictions.

Mr. GRAY. I do not question at all the proposition the Senator has just advanced. I only asked him a question in order that I might understand his proposition. I perhaps misunderstand it, and I wish to be corrected if I am wrong. I understand that the Senator's opposition to the proposition that the Executive can recognize the independency of a new government not heretofore existing in the family of nations is based on the ground that such an act is essentially a legislative act, because it creates a rule of conduct for officials and citizens that hitherto has not been created.

Mr. BACON. Yes.
Mr. GRAY. I understand that part of his argument correctly. Then I understand the last proposition, as to which I took the liberty of asking the question preceding this, to be that heretofore wherever the Executive has recognized the independence of a fore wherever the Executive has recognized the independence of a government the only validity that it had as a lawmaking act was from the implied or tacit acquiescence of Congress.

Mr. BACON. Exactly.

Mr. GRAY. My question is, whether any law can be created by the implied sanction of the Congress of the United States?

Mr. BACON. The distinguished Senator, I presume, would like to lead me off into a very hair-splitting discussion. The general proposition is this: There are a great many acts performed by the Executive which depend for their ultimate authority upon the fact that the Executive, as the executive arm of the Governthe fact that the Executive, as the executive arm of the Govern-ment, is doing that which, while not specifically and directly in terms authorized by the lawmaking power, is with its implied assent; and if the distinguished Senator will do me the honor to hear me to my conclusion I hope to satisfy him that the act of the Executive in the recognition of the independence of a nation does not depend upon the ultimate power and exclusive authority of the executive department to make such recognition, but depends upon the fact that Congress, which alone has this ultimate power,

Now, Mr. President, if the ultimate power is with Congress, and if Congress assents to it, it is a legal act, and whether it is an express or implied act, all legal consequences must flow from it as if it were directly authorized by Congress.

Mr. GRAY. I understand the Senator's proposition, and I shall

Mr. GRAY. I understand the Senator's proposition, and I shall not interrupt him further.

Mr. BACON. I have no objection to interruption.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Chilton in the chair).

Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Connections.

Mr. BACON. Certainly.
Mr. PLATT. How does the Senator claim that Congress assents?
Because it does not dissent?

Mr. BACON. Where it has knowledge of the facts, where the Mr. BACON. Where it has knowledge of the facts, where the Executive is proceeding and Congress has full opportunity to know and does know everything which is done, of course Congress assents. If the Senator from Connecticut will pardon me for a moment, and will allow me to get further into my argument, he will see what I mean. But in order that he may not misunderstand me now, I say the proposition which I shall endeavor to receive it is that the religious proposition is that the religious proposition is that the religious proposition which I shall endeavor to maintain is, that the ultimate power to determine whether a nation shall or shall not be recognized by this Government is a power in the lawmaking department of the Government, and that where the lawmaking department sits by in full knowledge of what is going on and permits the Executive to act as the agency, the medium through which this is always done, appropriates money to pay ministers, as is suggested to me by the Senator from Montana [Mr. Carter], or in any other way acquiesces in it, it is a con-

Mr. CARTER, or in any other way acquiesces in it, it is a confirmation of the act.

Mr. GRAY. The appropriation of money is an affirmative act.

I agree with the Senator.

Mr. BACON. It is an affirmative act, but it is an indirect affirmation. I will say to the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Connecticut that if they will permit me to develop the average of a little further, they will see what I mean without the argument a little further, they will see what I mean without causing me to explain each step as I go along. I do not, however, object to interruptions, and I shall be more than happy to answer any question, so far as my ability will enable me to do so, that may be asked by either of the distinguished Senators or by others.

Mr. GRAY. I recognize the Senator's courtesy in the matter. Mr. BACON. I had said that the simple declaration of a fact could not accomplish in the way of making a law which is to be enforced by courts what is accomplished whenever the legal declaration is made by competent authority of the independence of a nation, that that could only be accomplished by law, and that only Congress can, by the exercise of this power of recognition of the independence of a nation, declare such law.

Mr. President, there is yet another view, still more controlling, in my judgment, in support of the proposition (and I ask the attention of the Senator from Delaware and the attention of other Senators to this point, because it largely answers, I think, or rather bears upon the solution of the question which they propounded to me) that this power rests, under the Constitution, with Congress, and not with the Executive.

The recognition of the independence of a people, with all of the consequences which may flow from such recognition, is necessarily an act of the highest sovereignty. Mr. Seward, when Secretary of State, used this language in a letter addressed to Mr. Adams, then minister to England:

To recognize the independence of a new state, and so favor, possibly determine, its admission into the family of nations, is the highest possible exercise of sovereign power, because it affects in every case the welfare of two nations, and often the peace of the world.

The prerogative to determine upon the exercise of this highest possible sovereign power belongs properly and necessarily to that authority in the state which in its constitutional functions most fully represents its sovereignty. That authority in this Government is the lawmaking power.

The Government in its entirety is the sovereignty. But the Constitution has invested Congress with almost all of the prerogatives of that sovereignty. The broad, unlimited, and exclusive grant of all legislative powers under the Constitution, without more, carries with it the larger and most important part of the powers of sovereignty. But the enumeration in the Constitution of the powers of Congress goes further, conferring upon it, among others, the powers—
To lay and collect taxes.
To provide for the common defense and general welfare of the

To regulate commerce with foreign nations.
To coin money and regulate the value thereof.
To define and punish offenses against the law of nations.

To declare war.

To raise and support armies. To provide and maintain a navy.

To provide and maintain a navy.

To suppress insurrections and repel invasions.

Each of these, besides others of which I have omitted to make mention, is a distinct power of sovereignty—the powers which kings with unlimited power personally wield; and in addition thereto, after enumerating these most sovereign powers, there is the following comprehensive grant of power to Congress:

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

By this, not only is Congress clothed generally with all power of legislation necessary to carry into effect all the powers granted to Congress, but Congress is further and exclusively vested with the power to make any and all laws necessary and proper for the execution of any of the powers of the Government of the United execution or any of the powers of the Government of the United States and of any department of the Government. Mr. President, when to these great powers is joined the power to impeach and remove from office any officer of the Government, from the President to the lowest civil officer, little could be added to completely invest Congress with every attribute of the sovereignty of the Government.

Compared to this great array of sovereign powers granted to Congress, those conferred on the President present a most strik-Congress, those conferred on the President present a most striking contrast. He is clothed with the great power and responsibility of the execution of the laws, but beyond this the only pre-rogative of sovereignty with which he is exclusively invested is the pardoning power, and even that is denied to him in cases of impeachment by the House and conviction by the Senate. Least of all is there to him the slightest grant of the greatest of all pow-the power to make law.

Mr. President, the fact can not be too distinctly announced, it can not be too highly appreciated, that the only distinct prerogative of sovereignty which is granted to the President of the United States is the pardoning power, and in that he is limited in cases of impeachment, where he is denied the exercise of it. Least of all, Mr. President, is there the least grant of the slightest legislative function to the Executive of the Government.

We have passed by more than two hundred years the period in the history of our race when one man could assume and exercise the power to determine, independently of the legislative department, what should be, even in part, the laws of the government. The framers of the Constitution stood nearer by a hundred years than we do to the time when a king sought to rule without par-liament and in defiance of parliament, when he sought to take to himself all the powers of government and set at naught the laws and wishes of the country's constitutional legislators. The great and wise men who framed our fundamental law stood in the century next removed from that which had witnessed the culmination of that great struggle from the events of which they gathered the lesson that the material interests and the liberties of a people are safest when the great powers of government are lodged not in the control of one man, of whatever title or office, but in the hands of their elected representatives. They had learned from it that one man invested with such powers was quick to consider his own for-tunes and the fortunes of his favorites of more consequence than the prosperity of a whole people. They were taught by that his-tory to fear that one so girt with power would grow great in his own conceit, that he would attempt to draw to himself all the authority of government, and that, puffed up with the estimate of his own greatness, not only one born to the kingly office, but also one who held but temporarily the elective office of President, might come to think himself compassed with "the divinty that doth hedge a king."

These framers of the Constitution at that time, when they were defining the powers of the Executive doubtless then had in anticipation that the first President under the new Government would be Washington. They would not have feared to invest him with all power; but they looked beyond. While they hoped that only good and wise men would be chosen to that high office, they forgot not the frailties of the weak nor the grasping ambitions of the strong. They guarded against the worst. They designed that in the hands of a weak Executive the Government should not fail, and that in the hands of one strong, self-willed, and ambitious there should not be imperiled the free institutions which they sought to establish. Therefore while they created a great and noble office, one within its legitimate sphere the greatest and the noblest of all the earth, they designed that its greatness and noblity should not consist in the arbitrary powers of the kingly office. The greatness of the Presidential office does not consist in his will being the law to 70,000,000 people, but in the fact that the President in himself personifies the will of a great and free people as that will is expressed by them through another depart good and wise men would be chosen to that high office, they forpeople as that will is expressed by them through another department of the Government. No man can shut his eyes to the fact that, to that end, while they invested the President with all the dignity and power of the Executive office, they carefully withheld from him the grant of the powers of sovereignty. Every power given to him was most carefully restricted and guarded.

While they gave him the power of the veto, they gave to Congress the power to override his veto by a two-thirds vote of each House.

While they gave him power to negotiate treaties with foreign nations, they made such treaties of no effect until agreed to by

They gave him power to pardon those convicted of crime, but denied to him the power to pardon in cases of impeachment.

They gave him the power to appoint all civil officers, but except temporarily, when Congress is not in session, such appointments are of no validity until confirmed by the Senate.

They made him Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, but they left it to Congress to determine what should be the size and constitution of the Army and Navy and whether there should and constitution of the Army and Navy, and whether there should be any Army and Navy. They denied him the power to appoint a single officer of either the Army or the Navy, from the commanding officers to the lowest subalterns, unless each of such appointments should receive the confirmation of the Senate. They gave him no power to equip and maintain either Army or Navy for a day. They gave him no power to equip and maintain either Army or Navy for a day. They gave him no power to make war, nor can he of him-self conclude peace. The power to make rules for the government-and regulation of the Army and Navy is denied to him and is expressly conferred upon Congress. It is evident that as Com-mander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy he is but the executive arm, and that in that capacity he is himself in every detail and particular subject to the commands of the lawmeling.

arm, and that in that capacity he is himself in every detail and particular subject to the commands of the lawmaking power.

Finally they made the Chief Executive, as well as every other civil officer, from the head of the Cabinet to the most obscure civil official, subject to trial and removal from office, without appeal, upon impeachment by the House and conviction by the Senate—a power in much conservatism and wisdom but seldom exercised, but nevertheless a power, resting as it does, without defined limits but nevertheless a power, resting as it does, without defined limits as to what shall be deemed a high crime or misdemeanor, almost exclusively in the discretion of the House and Senate, which is the great safeguard against encroachment and official misconduct.

Mr. President, in this analysis I am attempting, by an examination of the various and relative powers conferred upon the legislative department on the one hand and those conferred upon the examination of the various and relative department on the one hand and those conferred upon the executive department on the other, to ascertain where properly rests the function of sovereign power in the exercise of which a people is recognized by this Government as a free and independent nation.

Upon this general analysis it would seem to be established that almost all of the functions of the sovereignty of the Government are vested in their ultimate power in the legislative department. It is further true that all the functions of the sovereignty of the Government, in so far as they necessitate affirmative determination and command, the directing of what shall be done and what shall not be done, are vested exclusively in the lawmaking power.

If the recognition of the independence of a people as a free and sovereign nation is in itself an act of high sovereignty—and who will gainsay it?—it would seem to be a necessary conclusion that in the absence of express grant to any particular department such act can only be legally performed under the determination, express or implied, of that department of the Government which has been invested with those functions of sovereignty involving the determination of all affirmative action by the Government.

Mr. President, if I am wrong in this view, if there is a single function of the executive department outside of the treaty-making power in which he is clothed with the power of a determination of any affirmative action other than that which he gets in the executive of the large I cheefed like for some Souther to rejud out of the large I cheefed like for souther to rejud out of the large I cheefed like for souther to rejud out of the large I cheefed like for souther to rejud out of the large I cheefed like for souther to rejud out of the large I cheefed like for souther to rejud out of the large I cheefed like for souther to rejud out of the large I cheefed like for souther to rejud out of the large I cheefed like for souther to rejud out of the large I chee of any amrinative action other than that which he gets in the execution of the laws, I should like for some Senator to point out where, under the Constitution of the United States, is the President authorized to perform one single affirmative act imposing new duties, outside of the treaty-making power, for which he does not get the authority by express statutory provision.

Mr. Gray and Mr. Platt addressed the Chair,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Delaware? Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. I call the attention of the Senator to what he has already no doubt considered, the power expressly given to the President to appoint ambassadors, ministers, consuls, etc., and to receive ministers from foreign governments.

Mr. BACON. I am speaking of an individual act of the President that he is authorized to perform, which shall have the effect to create a duty which theretofore did not exist. I am not speak-ing of an act that he is authorized to perform which has to be coning of an act that he is authorized to perform which has to be confirmed by this body. I shall have something to say upon the subject of the reception of ministers.

Mr. GRAY. But the fact that no ambassador or other public minister can be appointed except by the advice and consent of the Senate does not support the contention that Congress has any participation in the text.

Mr. BACON. I am not on that point now, Mr. President.
Mr. GRAY. The Senate is merely the advisory council of the executive branch, created by the Constitution.
Mr. BACON. I shall come to that question later. I am now upon a distinct question, and I am ready to answer any question the Senator will ask me upon that particular point. The question is whether there is under the Constitution of the United States authority to the President of the United States, not in conjunction with any other department, but of himself alone, to perform a single act the performance of which shall have the effect to create an obligation which did not theretofore exist.
Mr. GRAY. Suppose he receives a minister from a foreign

Mr. GRAY. Suppose he receives a minister from a foreign nation.

Mr. BACON. I am coming to that as a separate matter.
Mr. GRAY. Very well; then I will not anticipate the Senator.
Mr. BACON. I am ready to answer the Senator any question he may desire to ask me, so far as I may be able, which relates to the receiving of ambassadors.
Mr. GRAY. I pointed out one; but I do not want to anticipate Mr. GRAY. I pointed out one; but I do not want to anticipate the Senator's argument, of course.

Mr. BACON. I am speaking of an act which the President is to perform, which is binding upon our people, not an act performed in the reception of a minister.

Mr. GRAY. Is not that act binding upon our people?

Mr. BACON. I shall discuss that as a separate matter.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. How does the Senator from Georgia suppose the President gets the authority to make a demand upon a foreign power for an indemnity to be paid to this Government for losses which have been sustained by a citizen of the Government?

Mr. BACON. Certainly upon the ground that he is the executive officer, and he makes a demand as such, but a demand which Congress may at any time come in and stop and say he should not make. Therefore, he makes it by the implied assent of Con-Does the Senator dispute that if a demand were made upon gress. Does the Senator dispute that it a demand were made upon a foreign government by the President, Congress by joint resolution or by an act could say that that demand should not be proposed. I am speaking of ultimate power when I am talking about power. I say the ultimate power would be in Congress by act or by joint resolution to stop the President and say he shall not do it. Therefore, if that is the case it must be done by the invalid assent of Congress.

implied assent of Congress.

Mr. PLATT. Then I understand the Senator's position to be that the President as the executive officer is clothed with certain powers, but that Congress may overrule them. Is that it?

Mr. BACON. I mean to say that so far as the execution of the laws is concerned the President derives his authority from the Constitution, and so far as he exercises any other function where there is an express grant to him in the Constitution he exercises it by virtue of that express grant; but that in the general admin-istration of the executive office he is in the main executing the laws passed by Congress, laws over which Congress has the ultimate power either in their enactment or their repeal, and laws, therefore, in the execution of which Congress can at any time arrest him.

Mr. PLATT. Suppose the President makes a demand upon a foreign power to surrender a citizen unlawfully detained by that foreign power, where does he get that authority under the Consti-he was here at the time when I spoke of the Presidential office as one of the highest and noblest of all on earth, and gave the reasons one of the highest and noblest of all on earth, and gave the reasons upon which I based that opinion. I will say, in answer to the honorable Senator, that the President is undoubtedly clothed with every function which is expressly conferred upon him as the Executive for the purpose of carrying into effect the laws of the land, The great injunction imposed upon him by the Constitution is that he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed; and within the exercise of that power he is certainly supreme, except that it is within the power of Congress at any time to change any one of the laws that he is called upon to execute. Therefore, the ultimate power is in Congress.

Mr. HALE. Precisely. Is it not the logical result of the Senator's reasoning that the whole power of the Government is in the legislative branch; that the President is in operation only carrying out the laws of the Government enacted by the legislative branch; that he may at any time be arrested by the legislative branch in carrying out a law; and that therefore the sum and substance of all the Constitution is that the fathers ordained and established a legislative Government as the primal power? Is not that the contention of the Senator?

Mr. BACON. It is the lawmaking power, which consists not simply of this House and the other House, but consists of the majority of the Senate and of the House of Representatives in connection with the President, or two-thirds of the Senate and of the House without the President, and in despite of his disapproval.

That is the lawmaking power.

Mr. HALE. When the Senator says that the only duty of the President is to execute the law, that in the field of administration there is nothing but that, and that the legislative branch may at any time arrest him in executing the law, certainly if there is any logical force in that, it follows that as a component part of the Government, as a branch by itself independent, there is no such thing left, and the Executive is annihilated.

Mr. BACON. Will the distinguished Senator permit me to ask him if he doubts the proposition that it is within the power of Congress to repeal any law which is upon the statute book; and if when so repealed is not the power of the Executive to further execute that law gone; and if that applies to one law, does not it apply to all?

Mr. HALE. This is about the way I understand that. Another Senator has said, referring to the pardoning power which we believe to be lodged with the President, that Congress may we believe to be lodged with the President, that Congress may open the doors of every prison—

Mr. BACON. Not at all.

Mr. HALE. But another Senator said that. Can it not do so? Undoubtedly, but it would be revolutionary; undoubtedly it can do so, but it would not be within the scope, as I understand it, of the intention of the framers of the Constitution, who did make these distinct departments and serve artistic to the constitution. these distinct departments, and gave certain powers, some incidental, some direct.

My fault with the contention of the Senator is-and I see how

My lattic with the contention of the Senator is—and I see how closely he is pursuing it and how logical his march is in his reasoning—that it practically annihilates the Executive.

Mr. BACON. I think not, Mr. President. The Executive has a distinct office. The distinct office of the President is to execute the will of the lawmaking power so far as the general executive powers go. He has, in addition to that, other distinct and express grants of power the treaty making power, that is, the origination. grants of power, the treaty-making power; that is, the origination grants of power, the treaty-making power; that is, the origination of treaties, the reception of ambassadors and ministers, the appointment of civil officers, and other things which do not depend upon the legislative department. But the contention of the distinguished Senator that because, pursued to its legitimate end, the exercise of these powers would be revolutionary, certainly is no argument against the fact of their existence. That would be a very good argument against the revolutionary exercise of these powers, but we are not discussing the question as to whether or not the power should be abused. We are discussing the question as to where the power rests, and the fact that if abused it would be revolutionary does not controvert the proposition as to whether be revolutionary does not controvert the proposition as to whether that power does exist.

My proposition, in brief, Mr. President, is that the ultimate, final, supreme power is with the lawmaking power. I shall have something more to say hereafter which I hope may lead my distinguished friend from Maine to agree with me upon that subject.

Mr. HALE rose.

Mr. BACON. He gets it from the fact that he does it with the assent of the lawmaking power, for the reason that the lawmaking power could at any time step in and stop him.

Mr. HALE. May I ask the Senator from Georgia a question?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. HALE rose.

Mr. BACON. I desire to say, if my friend will pardon me a moment, that in the consideration of this question I am, so far as I know myself, controlled by a desire to arrive at the truth, independent of what influence it may have upon any pending question now exciting the public mind or engaging the attention of Congress. This question, in my opinion, Mr. President, of what are the legitimate bounds of the Executive authority and how far the legislative authority goes, is a question much higher, much more important to us than any question connected with the recognition or the nonrecognition of any particular people who may claim to be independent.

Mr. HALE. I understand the Senator not to be arguing the general subject of the Cuban revolution.

Mr. BACON. No, sir; not at all.

Mr. HALE. But only the law of the matter.

Mr. BACON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. Iask the Senator what would happen if, in the contingency of a people claiming recognition and sending an accredited agent to Washington, the President should receive that minister, that ambassador, that agent, by whatever name his credentials entitle him, and Congress in session being of a contrary opinion, that the nation was not entitled to recognition, and being entirely opposed to the President, and it being the lawmaking power, how opposed to the President, and it being the lawmaking power, now then would the Senator have Congress assert itself?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, in the subsequent part of my argument I am intending to deal with the particular question of the reception of ambassadors. If the distinguished Senator from Maine will pretermit his question for the present, and propound it again when I reach that branch of the argument, I shall be very happy to do what I can to answer it.

Mr. HALE. I shall be very glad to have an answer to it.

Mr. BACON. But at the present time it would not be exactly in the order of my argument.

Mr. HALE. I do not ask the Senator to do it now if it will interfere with his argument.

Mr. BACON. I shall be very happy to do so later, and the post-ponement of the answer will give me the assurance that I shall have the continued attention of the Senator until I come to that

Mr. GRAY. I do not intend to interrupt the Senator any longer nor to trespass upon his extreme courtesy in the matter of yielding to interruption, but he was speaking a moment ago in answer to the question as to where the Constituion had given the President any ultimate power over Congress—

Mr. BACON. Oh, no; that was not the question.

Mr. GRAY. Then I am mistaken in the Senator's proposition

Mr. BACON. It was the question, though I did not state it in

Mr. GRAY. The Senator alluded to the power to receive foreign ministers by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to send ambassadors to foreign countries, and omitted to mention the power absolutely ultimate, free from any participation on the part of Congress or control by Congress—I mean the pardoning power.

Mr. BACON. I am extremely unfortunate if I can not so express myself as to be understood on that particular point. There is no question about the fact that wherever there is an express power granted in the Constitution to the President and I express power granted in the Constitution to the President it does not depend in any manner upon the control of Congress, and I expressly said when enumerating the powers of the Executive that the only power of sovereignty which had been vested in the President was the pardoning power, and that all other important powers of sovereignty—those which are usually personally exercised by unlimited sovereigns—were in the lawmaking power, but that the pardoning power was the exception, although that was limited not to apply to cases of impeachment.

Mr. HOAR. I do not wish to ask the Senator a question for the purpose of antagonizing or testing his argument, but I should purpose of antagonizing or testing his argument, but I should like to understand, if I can, exactly the length to which he goes. I was obliged to be absent from the Chamber a few minutes during the first part of his argument. I want to ask the Senator's view of this proposition to see what he understands is exactly the constitutional position. Suppose that the lawyaking power constitutional position. Suppose that the lawmaking power enact—the President not assenting, but keeping the enactment ten days without any objection, or by a two-thirds vote, in either way in which we can pass laws—in these terms: "The Island of Cuba is hereby, and shall be, recognized as an independent power by the United States"—

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, I presume he intends to propound the same question he did the other day in reference to the happening of a case during the recess of Congress?

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps the Senator will allow me to state my question in a single sentence.

Mr. BACON. I was only going to suggest to the Senator that I shall come to that matter in a later part of my argument.

Mr. HOAR. Then I do not wish to interrupt the Senator.
Mr. BACON. I will hear the Senator.
Mr. HOAR. Suppose Congress should say, "The Island of Cuba is hereby, and shall be, recognized as a free and independent State until the 1st day of December next," then adjourn to the 1st of December next, and in the meantime the President of the United States desires to receive an ambassador from Spain; or suppose we say, "Cuba shall not be recognized," and Cuba meantime establishes her independence, and the President says, "I should like to receive an ambassador from Cuba, and in order to make arrangements for the exchange of ambassadors I will first recognize Cuba." Does that enactment of the lawmaking power bind the President during the recess of Congress, it having enacted in terms that he shall be so bound? That is what I want to know.

Mr. BACON. Do I understand the Senator to state the case where Congress has passed a law that a foreign country shall not be recognized?

Mr. HOAR. Either; put it that way if the Senator prefers.

Mr. BACON. I say when Congress passes a law that a foreign I say when Congress passes a law that a foreign country shall not be recognized there is no power in this country, the Executive or any other, which has power to make such recognition. But I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that in a later part of my argument I shall come to a discussion of that precise question, as to what is the effect of an enactment by Congress that it will or will not maintain diplomatic relations with another government. If the Senator will pardon me until that time, and will put his question later, I shall endeavor to answer

Mr. HOAR. I did not put the question for the purpose of antagonizing the Senator's argument, but simply to get at an understanding of the Senator's position.

Mr. BACON. Perhaps fortunately for the Senator from Massachusetts, but unfortunately for me, he has not been in the Senate during the hour I have been trying to state what my position is.

Mr. President, the legislative department, which is invested with the exercise of these great powers of sovereignty, has been most conservatively organized by the Constitution. The law-making power does not consist in the majorities of the two Houses, but in such majorities with the approval of the President, or two-thirds of each House despite the disapproval of the President. It is safer that the exercise of this high act of sovereignty should be committed to the House of Representatives, the Senate, and the President than to the President alone. The exercise of this power by the President alone is, in my judgment, diametrically opposed to the fundamental principles upon which our representative Government is founded.

Sir, it is a sound proposition of law that the President has only such powers as are directly conferred on him by the Constitution, and such other powers as are inherent in the office of Presidentthose which are necessary to the proper exercise of those directly granted. It is conceded by all that there is no such express grant in the Constitution. Unless, therefore, the right to the exercise of such power by the President is inherent in the office—unless, in other words, the exercise of this power by the President is necessary to the full and proper exercise of some power directly granted to him by the Constitution, the power does not exist at all as one of the functions of the executive office. I presume that as an inherent power from an express grant, it does not exist.

Mr. GRAY. In either branch of the Government?

Mr. BACON. Yes, that is true.

The important and controlling question, therefore, is, Is there such an inherent power; and if so, where is it to be found? To what power directly granted does it attach as an inherent power?

It can not be contended that it is a power generally inherent in the executive office. It is a power which may in other governthe executive office. It is a power which may in other governments, and under other systems, be frequently attached to the power of the executive office. It may be that the executive head under those governments and systems most usually exercises this power. But that fact does not establish the proposition that the power is inherent in the executive office. The general function of the Executive under our Government is to execute the laws, and no other power belongs to it except where specifically granted to it by the Constitution. I am speaking now of the general functions of the Executive, not of special grants. The recognition of the independence of a people has no relation to the exercise of such general executive function. The exercise of the power of recognition can not by any strained construction be shown to be essential to the proper and full exercise of the power to execute existing laws. It can not be made to appear that any single law would fail of execution at the hands of the President because of would fail of execution at the hands of the President because of his inability to exercise the power of recognizing the independence of a foreign people. If it can, I should be very glad for some Senator, if not now, at a time when this question may be further discussed, to point out the single law which the President could not properly execute if, he did not have the power to recognize the independence of a foreign government—one single law, the execution of which would fail if he did not have that power. I am not now speaking of a special grant, but of a single law which he would not have the power to execute in the exercise of his general functions as the Executive. his general functions as the Executive.

The recognition of the independence of a people is in no sense the execution of a law, unless a law has been enacted that there shall be such recognition.

Where such recognition is the independent act of the President, so far from it being in any sense an execution of law, so far from its having any relation to the execution of law, it is, as I have endeavored to show, an act in the nature of making law.

So that I think it may be safely assumed that the power to recognize the independence of a people is not an inherent power essential to the proper and full discharge of the general powers of the Executive office.

We must therefore examine to see whether it is an inherent power essential to the proper execution of any particular function specifically devolved by the Constitution upon the President. There are but three powers conferred by the Constitution upon the President which relate to foreign peoples or govern-

The first of these powers, which is found in the second section of the second article, is that-

He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senate present concur.

The very most that could possibly be contended under this provision is that the recognition of the independence of a nation is in the nature of a treaty; but if so, it disposes of the contention that the power rests exclusively in the President, for if the power of recognition lay here it would require the consent of the Senate. So that nothing can be taken by those who claim the recognition of independence as an exclusive executive power, from that provision of the Constitution.

I will not stop now to discuss whether the power of recognition is a part of the treaty-making power, as I am now discussing the proposition that the power is not exclusively in the President. That it is his exclusive power is the contention of the Secretary of State, and that, as I understand, is the contention of the Senators who oppose the view which I take of this matter.

The second of these powers is found in the same section of the Constitution, and provides-

And he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls.

It is true of this provision, as it is of the preceding, that all power granted by it is shared by both the Senate and the Executive, and any inherent power arising under either provision must necessarily belong to both the Executive and the Senate, and does not belong to either exclusively long to either exclusively.

I do not understand that the exclusive power of recognition is claimed for the Executive under either of these provisions, and I only cite them in order that every line in the Constitution relating to any connection of the President with foreign affairs may be brought within the scope of this examination.

The third and only remaining power relating to foreign governments or peoples which the Constitution confers upon the President is in the third section of the second article, which is as follows:

He shall receive ambassadors and other public ministers.

Upon this slender grant, this single line, imposing the duty of a ceremonial, is attempted to be rested this vast power with its farreaching consequences, the exercise of which must be conceded by all to be one of the highest attributes of sovereignty. There is no legitimate construction of this clause which will sustain this conclusion.

There can be no question that the design of the Constitution is that the Executive shall be the medium of official intercourse between this Government and those of foreign nations. The conbetween this Government and those of foreign nations. The conferring of the power to initiate the making of treaties evidences sufficiently that design. The imposition of the duty to receive ambassadors and ministers is further evidence of it. It is necessary that a foreign minister accredited by his government should be officially received, and the President is designated to formally and officially receive him. That is the plain language of the grant. The inherent power under this grant is to hear officially whatever message or communication such ambassadors or ministers may bear from their governments to this Government.

As the President is the medium through which this Government.

As the President is the medium through which this Government receives communications from foreign governments, as he is the medium through which this Government communicates with foreign governments, as he is the officer designated to negotiate the treaties which are to be submitted to the Senate, the design of the Constitution in designating him as the officer of the Government to receive ambassadors and ministers is very plain; and it is not necessary to look beyond the functions the exercise of which is required to carry out these purposes in order to determine what inherent powers go along with this grant to the President.

By no legitimate construction can the imposition by the Consti-tution of the duty to receive ambassadors and ministers carry with it such inherent power as makes the President the arbitrary and absolute controller of the relations between this Government and all foreign governments, the making of treaties alone excepted.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? Mr. BACON. Certainly. Mr. HALE. I see clearly the Senator's reasoning strips the President, under the constitutional provision which gives him the power to receive ambassadors, of everything except a ceremonial power. Let me ask the Senator— Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon. If he had observed what I said-

Mr. HALE. I have listened to every word the Senator has said. I went further than a ceremonial. I spoke of Mr. BACON. the fact that the President is the medium through which this Government makes its negotiations, which is more than a cere-

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator whether that provision of the Constitution does not clothe the President not only with the power of receiving—a ceremonial—but with the critical, underlying power of selecting the time that he shall receive that ambassador?

Mr. BACON. When the President shall receive him?

Mr. HALE. Is not the one essential question as to recognition,
When has the time come that this Government shall receive?

and is there not in that power given to the President something clearly beyond ceremonial?

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator ask me whether or not that power does not carry with it the inherent power to determine whether that ambassador represents such an independent government as will justify the President in receiving him? Is that the question?

Mr. HALE. The question amounts to that. When I ask if it does not give the President power to select the time when he shall receive, does not that carry with it the power of deciding the time when a foreign government shall be recognized?

Mr. BACON. When the Senator speaks of the time, does he mean the time in the history of the country or the time in the period of the year?

Mr. HALE. The date, the hour, at which the President will receive the representative of a people claiming to be an independent government.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator mean as to what time in his business can the President spare the particular minute when he will receive such a representative? I am asking for information, for I really do not understand the Senator's question.

Mr. HALE. I will put it as the Senator says. Does not the constitutional provision which gives the President power to receive ministers, ambassadors, and agents, give him necessarily the authority to settle the critical time when that nation shall be recognized?

Mr. BACON. I am asking the Senator, in order that I may answer his question, whether he refers to the time in the history answer his question, whether he refers to the time in the history of the government, or the proposed or alleged government, or whether he means a particular time as to the President's own personal engagements?

Mr. HALE. It is the same thing. If the President decides that he will not receive the minister, then there is no recognition; but if the President decides that he will, on next Friday, receive the accredited agent of a people claiming to be an actual government, does not that power that he has of fixing the time clearly lodge in him the whole question of recognition?

Mr. BACON. I will say, in answer to the Senator, that I am

Mr. BACON. I will say, in answer to the Senator, that I am going to discuss at this immediate time the particular question as to how far the right to receive ambassadors clothes the President with the power of deciding the question whether or not an alleged nation is entitled to be recognized as an independent nation, if that is the question.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator, then, if he thinks it is worth tor desires me to answer it.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator will, if he thinks it is worth while, tell us what his view is upon the very subject of the right of the President to receive—which must be done at some particular time in the history of the country asking to be received—whether that does not leave with the President the power of recognition?

Mr. BACON. If the Senator means by his question to ask me whether there is anything in the grant of power to the President to receive an ambassador or a minister which carries with it the inherent power, either directly or indirectly, to determine finally, absolutely, and without appeal, whether a government is an independent nation or not an independent nation, I answer him no, I do not think there is any such. If that is not comprehensive I do not think there is any such. If that is not comprehensive, I will say that I do not think under any circumstances that that inherent, final, unlimited power exists; and it can not be accomplished by the President through his supreme, unlimited power, either by direction or by indirection.

Mr. HALE. What would be the result for the time being, if Congress were not in session, if the President—

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, it is now past 4 o'clock. I should be more than willing to follow the Senator from Maine through a general discussion as to any questions which he might desire to propound, but I wish to present a connected argument, and many of the questions which the Senator is now asking me I shall endeavor to answer in the progress of this argument.

Mr. HALE. Of course I could not understand what the Senator's line was, and I waited

Mr. BACON. But the best way, I submit to the Senator, is to give me the opportunity to develop it, and I can not have the opportunity if the Senator, before I have developed the argument, anticipates and asks questions which will be answered later.

Mr. HALE. I see the force of what the Senator says, but the Senator will remember that when some questions were asked by other Senators at a former time during his very able and entertaining speech, he suggested that they wait until he came to this part of his speech.

Mr. BACON. I have just simply touched it.

Mr. HALE. As the Senator had reached that part, I ventured to put two or three questions. But I will not trouble the Senator

Mr. BACON. I have reached it, but I have not got into it. The Senator stops me at the threshold.

Mr. HALE. I will not trouble the Senator again.

Mr. BACON. I have remarked that by no legitimate construction, in my opinion, can the exercise of this simple duty to receive ambassadors and ministers be so extended as to make the Presiamnassadors and ministers be so extended as to make the Frest-dent of the United States, as is claimed by those who say that he has this exclusive power, the absolute, unqualified, uncontrolled, and uncontrollable power to decide as to all matters relating to our foreign relations, so far at least as they include any question of the recognition of the independence of a people claiming to be free and independent; and yet that is the result to which the contention must lead. If it had been intended—and I ask the Senator's consideration of this proposition—by the grant of power to receive ambassadors and ministers to confer with it the power to recognize the independence of a foreign nation, the exercise of that power by the President would doubtless also have been guarded as was the treaty-making power, by requiring the advice and conas was the treaty-making power, by requiring acceptance sent of the Senate to act.

Mr. HALE. Now the Senator asks me a question.

Mr. BACON. I was not conscious of the fact. If the Senator so construes it, it is all right.

Mr. HALE. The Senator put it in that form. I will not take

Mr. HALE. The Senator put it in that form. I will not take advantage of that lapse of the Senator. The Senator did ask me a question.

Mr. BACON. I certainly have not indicated any indisposition to have the Senator interrupt me. I am always more than happy to agree with the Senator, and always very much distressed when I differ with him. It gives me very great distrust when I do. The contention is that the duty imposed upon the President to receive ambassadors and ministers necessarily involves the duty of determining what governments are such free and sovereign governments as are entitled to send ambassadors or ministers to this Government; and further, that as he can not determine whom to receive and whom to refuse to receive as ambassadors or ministers unless he also exercises the power to determine what states are sovereign and independent, therefore the power to determine and recognize the independence of a nation is a power inherent in the power to receive ambassabors and ministers. That is the whole argument in a nutshell, as I understand it, and there is no other single line or letter in the Constitution upon which this power is claimed than the single line that the President shall have the power and it shall be his duty to receive ambassadors and ministers and consuls.

If it be true (and I ask the attention of Senators who are law-yers to this proposition) that there is no reasonably practical way in which the President can be informed what government is enti-tled to send ambassadors or ministers to this Government, unless the Executive has the original, absolute, and exclusive power to determine what nation is a free and independent nation, and what nation is not a free and independent nation, then the argument is sound. I concede it, if that be true. In that case the power claimed for him is one of his inherent powers, because without it he could not perform the duty of receiving ambassadors and ministers.

But if, on the contrary, it be true that it is entirely practical for the Executive to receive from the lawmaking power of the Government the necessary direction through joint resolution, in cases of doubtful or disputed independence, then the argument is not sound. In that case the power claimed for him is not one of his inherent powers, because without its exercise by him he can perform the duty of receiving ambassadors and ministers.

Mr. President, let me suggest an illustration, and I ask the attention and consideration of the distinguished Senators who have so kindly given me their attention during the progress of this argument to this illustration upon the point whether or not the duty to receive ministers carries with it the inherent power to determine, as a supreme constitutional power, whether or not a government is an independent nation. By some, in times past, Senators have indicated.

The position that Congress is the ultimate power to determine whether in a disputed case a nation is or is not an independent nation is fortified by the consideration that the necessary meaning of this provision of the Constitution is that the President shall receive ambassadors or ministers from such governments as the law which shall prescribe what shall be done in such cases as the Senators have indicated.

right to receive a Senator except from a State which is one of these United States—a member of the Federal Union. When a Senator presents himself to be received here, how does the Senate determine that the State whose credentials he holds is one of this class? Is it determined arbitrarily, under its own judgment, and in obedience to its own will? No. It turns to the records and ascertains that the State in question is one of the original thirteen, or it turns to the statute book and finds that this same sovereign lawmaking power has enacted that it has become one of the United States entitled to send Senators here. It matters not whether the designation of Senators as ambassadors is apt, the purpose of the illustration is served. It would be just as logical to claim it as one of the inherent rights of this Senate to determine, by its own judgment and will, independently of any statute and in defiance of the lawmaking power, whether a community offering to send a Senator to this body was or was not a State in the Union as to claim that the President must necessarily exercise the exclusive power to determine upon and recognize the independence of a people in order that he might properly perform the duty of receiving ambassadors and ministers.

Mr. WHITE, Will the Senator from Georgia permit me to ask him a question? Mr. BACON.

Certainly.

Mr. WHITE. Suppose the case of a country which by means of a revolution has actually severed itself from another country; that Congress had not recognized its independence, but that a party claiming to be and actually being the accredited party representing the government presents himself to the President and claims to be the ambassador or minister of that government. Would the reception of such minister or representative by the President be a recognition of the independence of that govern-

As a final recognition, I should certainly say no.

Mr. BACON. As a final recognition, I should certainly say no.

It would be a recognition upon which courts could act.

Mr. WHITE. Allow me to present another question. Could such recognition be revoked at all by anybody?

Mr. BACON. I recognize the principle of law—there is no question about this—that whenever there has been an authoritative recognition of a government it can not be revoked; but I say that whenever there has been simply a tentative reception of an ambassawhenever there has been simply a tentative reception of an ambassa-dor from a government not theretofore independent, done during a recess of Congress by the Executive, while it would give him a certain quasi position which the courts would recognize so long as he occupied it, it would be competent for the lawmaking power, when Congress assembled, to determine whether or not that government which claimed to be independent and which represented a people who had sundered a certain portion of territory from another country with which this Government was in amicable relations, should so stand as an independent country, or whether this Government should refuse to recognize it and say it still constituted an integral part of the mother country. I will come in a moment to a line of argument which sustains that proposition.

Mr. HALE. Then the Senator would say that after recognition, in the manner which has been indicated by him, had been granted by the Executive and the minister had been received and had assumed the functions of a minister, Congress could order him sent home?

Mr. BACON. Most undoubtedly. I do not hesitate on that proposition, sir—not a particle.

But, Mr. President, right in that connection I wish to say that But, Mr. President, right in that connection I wish to say that while of course the argument of inconvenience is a proper argument for consideration, it is never an argument which can settle finally the question of legal power. The illustrations as to the argument of inconvenience which the distinguished Senator from California and the distinguished Senator from Maine suggest to me are both of them illustrations which would be met easily by the lawmaking power if it would take up this subject and legislate on it as it ought to do. If the power rests with Congress to determine when a nation is an independent nation, if that is the highest act of sovereignty, as Mr. Seward said it was, if it belongs properly to the department of government which exercises almost without exception all of the powers of the sovereignty of this Government, the fact that it can not be conveniently exercised by Congress by act or joint resolution during a recess, does not pre-Congress by act or joint resolution during a recess, does not prevent this Congress or any future Congress from passing a general law which shall prescribe what shall be done in such cases as the Senators have indicated.

which heasked me, although not direct. The legitimate construction of that is that he shall receive ambassadors and ministers from such governments as Congress shall consent to have diplomatic relations with.

This consent is assumed to be given in the cases of all civilized independent nations with which this Government is at peace. But will anyone contend for a moment that it is beyond the power of Congress to say by statute or joint resolution that this Government will not hold diplomatic relations with any particular government it may designate? Mr. President, it is understood to be true that during the past twelve months or so there have been thirty or forty thousand or more of Armenians—defenseless men, women, and children—mercilessly butchered in Turkey, and that this has been done, if not by the command, with the wish and approval of the Turkish Government. Suppose that Congress by a joint resolution or statute regularly enacted should declare the Turks to be without the pale of civilization, that they are savages and fiends, and order that this Government thereafter shall hold no diplomatic relations with the Turkish Government. Will it be contended for a moment that when diplomatic relations with that Government were thus sundered by Congress the President could refuse to obey the law and still receive a minister from Turkey? If Congress has the power to sunder diplomatic relations with Turkey and send away her minister and prohibit the reception of any diplomatic representative from that Government, it has the power to do the like, in its discretion and judgment, in the case of any other govern-

It is difficult to see any ground upon which an argument can be based denying the power of Congress in such case. The power to declare war, which is by the Constitution vested in Congress exclusively, must of necessity include the inferior power to sunder diplomatic relations, not only when war is declared, but at any time, and for any cause by it deemed to be sufficient. The power to declare war must involve the ultimate supreme control of all these relations out of which war near conw. It must therefore those relations out of which war may grow. It must therefore follow logically that if Congress has the power in its discretion thus to sunder diplomatic relations and to forbid the reception of an ambassador or minister from that government, then Congress is the final power to determine from what countries ambassadors or ministers shall be received. If so, the President is but the agency designated for the reception of ambassadors or ministers from governments with which Congress directly or tacitly consents to hold diplomatic relations.

It is idle to say that power to the contrary rests with the Executive unless we are prepared to go further and admit that the President would still have the right to officially receive in the Executive Mansion and negotiate with a foreign minister after Congress had by law duly enacted declared there should be no diplomatic relations between this Government and the government of that minister. I must believe, Mr. President, that the most ardent advocate of extreme executive prerogatives will hesitate before he will undertake to maintain that the President has any such antecratic power.

tate before he will undertake to maintain that the President has any such autocratic power.

To what conclusion then, Mr. President, does this proposition, if successfully maintained, inevitably lead? The inherent power to recognize and determine, so far as this Government is concerned, the question of the independence of a nation is claimed for the Executive upon the ground that it is for him to determine what government is entitled to send an ambassador or minister to this Government. But if this premise is not true, if on the contrary the controlling power rests with Congress to determine whether any ambassador or minister shall be received by this Government from any designated people or government, then the inherent power does not belong to the Executive. The inherent power must follow the original power, and it also must vest with such original power in Congress. It is impossible as a proposition of law that the inherent power shall rest exclusively in the President, while the original power, which alone gives existence to the inherent power, rests ultimately and absolutely with Congress.

Sir, I must utterly dissent from the proposition that the duty of receiving ambassadors and ministers in the contemplation of the Constitution devolves upon the President the power, in his single will, to determine without regard to the sanction of the lawmaking power, whether a minister is accredited to this Government by a government of a free and independent nation where that question is in dispute. The ambassadors and ministers which the Constitution has in contemplation—directs the President to receive—are those from recognized independent government. dent to receive—are those from recognized independent governments—governments the existence and independence of which are so universally recognized and undisputed that courts would take so universary recognized and undisputed that courts would take judicial knowledge of their status, and of which the President would take like knowledge, without proof. The whole theory of our Government, as well as the genius and purpose of our free representative institutions, are utterly at war with the construction that out of the simple duty imposed to receive ambassadors and ministers should be evolved the sovereign power in the Executive, in his unrestrained discretion and in pursuance of his unbridled will, to say authoritatively and finally that a people theretofore a part of a recognized foreign sovereignty either had or had not won the right to be a new, independent nation, and thus say and authoritatively decree, even though his judgment were opposed by the opinions and wishes of the entire Congress and of the entire people.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to make a suggestion to the Senator from Georgia at this point. I do not want to interrupt him, however.

Mr. BACON. It is no interruption.

Mr. ALLEN. It is a point in connection with the thought he is now developing. If the position of the Senator from Maine be true, that the power to recognize is an original and exclusive power of the Chief Executive, then, if he shall see fit to do so, he is the contraction of the chief that the contraction of the chief that the contraction of the chief that t might recognize a straggling community of a few hundred people, which would be binding upon us.

Mr. BACON. I will come to a case of that kind in a moment.

Mr. BACON. I will come to a case of that kind in a moment. Mr. ALLEN. Or he might deny recognition to a perfectly established nation of a million or more people.

Mr. BACON. That is right. I will come to that point later. If this power is vested by the Constitution in the Executive it is an unlimited power. There is no escape from that proposition. There are in such case no bounds set within which he is authorized to act and beyond which he can not go. There is in such case no other power in the Government which can either command or stay his action. The score of his discretion is without limit. or stay his action. The scope of his discretion is without limit, and his single will is absolute law. What he refuses to do no other power in the Government can do or compel him to do. What he does no other power in the Government can oppose or prevent. His uncontrolled and uncontrollable action in the exercise of an act of the highest sovereignty of the Government—one which, so far as the action of this powerful Government can affect it, alters the map of the world, and changes the relation of this Government to other governments—one which may in strong probability involve it in war—such an action, within his sole power, is final, without appeal and without power of reversal!

Those who claim that this power rests exclusively in the Executive must follow their argument to its final results, and they can not escape the conclusion that if this contention is correct no monarch in the day of arbitrary and unlimited rule ever wielded more absolute and unquestioned power than does the President of the United States in this regard. I will add that there is not on earth to-day a constitutional monarch who personally wields such power; not one.

If there should be an insurrection in Manitoba and its leaders should set up a government for the whole of Canada, and the President should recognize the independence of Canada against the opinion and wish of Congress and of the whole country, it the opinion and wish of Congress and of the whole country, it would, if their contention be true, be a final act beyond the power of question or control by Congress. On the other hand, if at the time of the beginning of an Administration the Cubans should drive every Spaniard off the island and set up and maintain a government complete in all its functions and recognized by every other nation on the earth and the President should refuse throughout his term of office to recognize Cuban independence, such refusal would prevent recognition for four years even though every member of Congress and every other man in the United every member of Congress and every other man in the United States favored such recognition. It will be said that these are extreme and improbable cases, and I reply that the correctness of propositions is tested by extreme cases.

Mr. President, it is the evident purpose of the Constitution, in case the President and Congress should unfortunately come in conflict, that the latter should control the former. It limits the President's exercise of almost every important function by requiring thereto the approval and cooperation either of the two Houses of Congress or of the Senate. But more than this, it puts absolutely within the power of Congress, two-thirds of each House concurring, without his approval, and despite his disapproval, to dictate to him every law that he shall administer. And as a final evidence of this intent, the Constitution places within the power of a majority of the House and of two-thirds of the Senate to impeach and remove the President from office for any alleged mispeach and remove the President from office for any alleged misconduct which they may deem to be a high crime and misdemeanor. How is it possible to recognize such intent to place controlling power in the hands of Congress, with the contention that the Con-stitution has clothed the President with exclusive, absolute, un-limited power, regardless of the will of Congress, in dealing with all the foreign relations of this Government, the making of treaties alone excepted.

The utter unreasonableness, the monstrosity of such a contention, is found in the fact that the management and control of the foreign relations is one of the chief functions of the Federal Government. Of the two principal objects which led to the formation of the Federal Government, one was to regulate and control the reciprocal relations between the several States, and the other was to regulate and control the relations between foreign governments and the States in the aggregate. The position is unreasonable and untenable that in the formation of a government where such care was taken to deny the Executive every attribute of sovereignty, the pardoning power alone excepted, there should be found, not by express grant, but by inference only, an intention to confer upon the President royal power, unrestrained and unlimited, in the widereaching and important matter of foreign relations, excepting only in the matter of treaties.

The contention that it was the intention of the Constitution to confer the unlimited and exclusive power upon the President in dealing with any branch of foreign affairs is utterly irreconcilable with the fact that the Constitution does not permit him to declare war, that it only permits him to make a treaty with a foreign nation when two-thirds of the Senate consents to it, and that it requires him to procure the consent of the Senate to every that it requires him to procure the consent of the Senate to every foreign appointment he makes, from the ranking ambassador to England down to the humblest consul in the Island of Haiti.

Mr. President, it is not only opposed to the spirit of our representative institutions and to the letter of the Constitution that such unlimited power should be placed in the hands of one man, but it would be unsafe to do so. The President is but one man taken from the ranks of the public men of the country, in most instances not superior either in ability or experience to the average of those standing in the front rank.

of those standing in the front rank.

In this day of the powerful influences exerted by powerful interests it is safer that the determination of such great questions should not be within the will and discretion of any one man, but that these questions should be under the control of the great law making power, which has been invested by the Constitution with almost every function of sovereignty in the Government.

Mr. President, there are strong and ingenious arguments urged in favor of the possession of this exclusive and sovereign power by the Executive, but I submit that no argument is conclusive on this question which does not rest upon a grant of power in the Constitution, either express or implied. These arguments are in the main rested upon the facts that the executive department has in a number of instances assumed to exercise the power; that the officers of the executive department have, in their diplomatic correspondence, claimed the right in that department to exercise the power, and that there are cases in which the dicta of the courts speak of it as an executive power.

These facts, while entitled to weight and consideration, are none of them conclusive in the settlement of this question.

In the many instances which have been cited in which the Executive has recognized a change of government or the independence of a nation there is not one in which it may not be shown ence of a nation there is not one in which it may not be shown that the act was with the actual or implied assent of Congress. There is not a single instance in which there is the least evidence of opposition by Congress and action by the Executive contrary to the will and wishes of Congress. The Executive is the agency through which the lawmaking power of the Government deals with foreign governments. Much is left to the judgment and discretion of the executive department, and so long as the acts of the department are not objected to by Congress they are tacitly acquiesced in by the lawmaking power.

Furthermore, it is true that a very large number of these recognitions as shown by the memorandum submitted by the Senognitions, as shown by the memorandum submitted by the Senator from Maine, were made by accrediting diplomatic agents or consuls to the new governments, all of whom were necessarily confirmed by the Senate. In such cases there was not only the implied assent of Congress to the act of recognition, but the direct action of the Senate.

So that the instances cited of the exercise of this power by the Executive do not constitute precedents establishing the rule in Executive do not constitute precedents establishing the rule in favor of this exclusive right or power in the Executive and in denial of the final right of control in the lawmaking power.

The Senator from Maine, who does me the honor to be interested in this argument, was engaged at the time I stated the proposition—in which, if I am incorrect, I hope the Senator at some future time will set me right—that there is no instance in the history of this Company to have the Executive has a considered.

future time will set me right—that there is no instance in the instory of this Government where the Executive has exercised this power in conflict with the express will of Congress to the contrary.

Nor do the writings and diplomatic correspondence of officers of the executive department furnish a sufficient basis for the contention in favor of this exclusive Executive power, except in so far as they are shown to be rested upon constitutional grant of power. That these officers of the executive department should endeavor to magnify their office is not to be wondered at. That their claims thus expressed have provoked the utterance of no dissent from Congress is due to the fact that in no instance prior to the utterances of Secretary Olney have they, in asserting them, directly antagonized the legislative department and made an issue as to the right and power of Congress to deal authoritatively with the question. That antagonism has now been directly made and that issue has now been distinctly raised by the present Secretary of State. In anticipation of the action of Congress he has in the most public manner denied its power, defied its authority, and proclaimed through the press to foreign nations that even if such proposed action should be formulated and put upon the statute books in due form of law, the President would not obey it. He has practically threatened Congress with the veto of the President, and added that if passed over his veto it would be flung back in the face of Congress as so much waste paper. Never was challenge of power more sharply made; never was defiance of authority more boldly given. If Congress is acquiescent, if the challenge is unheeded, if the defiance is permitted to pass without the assertion by Congress of its preparent in much be conferred that tion by Congress of its prerogative, it must be confessed that there will be in such case at least one precedent of claim of exclu-sive power by the executive department which will in the future count against the right of Congress to claim this power as one of its prerogatives.

Neither do the advocates of this exclusive power find support in any judicial decision on this question. All the utterances of the courts, in so far as they appear to class this as an exclusive Executive power, are mere obiter dicta, which these courts themselves would refuse to regard as decisions if the question were now directly presented for their adjudication. There is no single case in which the issue therein presented was whether this power belonged exclusively to the Executive or to the lawmaking power. The issue in each of these cases was simply whether there had been recognition by the Government, and while deciding that issue the ascription of the power to any one department was, as every lawyer must recognize, mere obiter.

And, sir, in the consideration of these utterances by the courts, the fact is not to be overlooked that wherever the power rests to determine upon the act of recognition, the performance of the act of recognition undoubtedly rests with the Executive. It is through the Executive that the fact of recognition by the supreme power is made known to the people thus recognized. In dealing with the question whether there had or had not been recognition in a particular case the courts, in speaking of such recognition by the Executive, can only be legitimately construed to have reference to the particular function of the act of recognition by the Executive, without reference to the particular department of the Government having the final power to determine upon and direct such act. I will not attempt now to discuss the question of the power of the courts to decide upon the exercise by Congress of its political powers. It is sufficient to say that the question has so far never been decided by the courts. And the case has never been made which would have justified them in attempting so to decide; not one can be found in the books.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator whether in making that assertion he has in view the case in 3 Sumner, in which Judge

Mr. BACON. Possibly the Senator did not understand the statement which I made. The statement I made was that there never had been a case made where the distinct issue, where the question to be decided, that upon which and under which rights were to be determined, was whether a recognition by the executive department in contradistinction to the right of the legislative was a valid recognition.

Mr. GRAY. But there is a case reported in 3 Sumner—
Mr. BACON. There are plenty of cases where they speak—
Mr. GRAY. In which the only recognition had been the executive recognition, and the court decided distinctly there that it was a recognition which the judicial department would recognize as valid.

Mr. BACON. Most undoubtedly, and in accord with what I have said. All this recognition was through the executive department. There is no other medium by which recognitions are My contention is that the ultimate power to decide whether it shall be done or not is in the legislative department, and that where there is no disavowal by the legislative department, and that where there is no disavowal by the legislative department, especially where they go forward and do acts which show that they confirm it, it is an affirmation of it—a ratification.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Georgia permit me to ask him there what he says as to the case which—him there what he says as to M.

Mr. BACON. Which the Senator suggested?

Mr. HOAR. Not exactly that, but upon this particular point:
Suppose on the 5th day of March of a year when Congress adjourned the 3d, the President recognizes a new government. Now, there is no meeting of Congress until December, and of course there is no implied acquiescence of Congress. Does that have any lawful effect whatever, or any lawful relation to conduct of American citizens during the summer? Is the ambassador who is received entitled to sue in the Supreme Court of the United States for that summer? Mr. BACON. I will state to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts that the same question has already been asked me, at a time when the Senator was not in the Chamber, by the Senator from California [Mr. White], and that I have already answered it. But I will answer it again in brief. I say that of course the reception by the President is good so far as an official recognition that the courts will enforce, that it is in the nature of a tentative recognition. All intervening rights, of course, would be preserved under that recognition, just like the de facto acts of any government or officer; but it is within the power of Congress when it convenes to say as to that particular piece of territory which the President had determined should thereafter be an independent government and should not thereafter be a part of the mother country, that the action is reversed and we do not approve of it, and it is still a part of Great Britain, for instance, or Spain, or any other country.

Mr. HOAR. Then, until Congress has negatived the President's act, it is valid?

Mr. BACON. Mr. BACON. Until Congress negatives the President's act it is in the nature of a tentative recognition, and in that case it entitles them to legal rights.

Mr. HOAP

Mr. HOAR. And the recognition is binding on our courts and on our citizens?

Mr. BACON. I will say to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts that that particular illustration and that particular answer was suggested to me by one of the strongest constitutional lawyers known to this country, and one who has held (I will not say whether he does not now hold) a very high judicial position.

Mr. HOAR. I simply wanted to understand the Senator. Then, taking the ground, as the Senator does, that the Executive may make a recognition which shall be binding on the courts and on American citizens and every portion of the country until Congress has negatived it, does the Senator say we should pass a resolution declaring that the power is exclusively one in Congress?

Mr. BACON. I think so most undoubtedly, because the ultimate power is there and the validity of it depends upon the implied assent of Congress.

Mr. HALE. Does the SenatorMr. BACON. But, if the Senat Mr. BACON. But, if the Senator will pardon me just a moment and then I will hear him, I want to finish this point. I wish to say that the distinguished and honorable Senator from Massachusetts has not done me the honor to hear my argument, and he comes in momentarily and propounds a question which, if he had heard the whole of it, he would not have put. I desire also to repeat that the argument of inconvenience does not overthrow a legal proposition; that the argument of inconvenience is one to be met by appropriate legislation. I would suggest that the proper legislation in this case is in the recognition by Congress of its supreme and ultimate power, and in a provision which will meet all of the cases that the distinguished Senator suggests might produce inconvenience. It is perfectly competent, if the ultimate power is in Congress, for Congress to pass a law which shall regu-late the manner in which the President shall proceed under such circumstances, and to preserve the rights of all parties. shall be glad to hear the distinguished Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. I was only going to suggest that the Senator's argument, ingenious as it is, enforces more strongly than ever upon me the strength of the proposition in the Constitution that the President may receive ambassadors. Otherwise the contention of the Senator must amount to this, that the receiving of ambassadors does not fix the status of the state received; that it ambassadors does not fix the status of the state received; that it is only a temporary act to be overridden by Congress, and that the provision should have been, in order that the language might measure the effect, "temporarily receive."

Mr. BACON. No, sir; not by any means.

Mr. HALE. Clearly that is the result that the Senator reaches.

Mr. BACON. Not at all.

Mr. HALE. Because he says that, although on the 5th of March, after the adjournment of Congress, the President receives an ambassador, it does not fix the status of the country received; it does not fix its recognition except temporarily and that when it does not fix its recognition except temporarily, and that when Congress assembles it may at once, without stretch of power but by powers clearly granted to it, overthrow the whole thing. If that be true, it is certainly only a temporary reception.

Mr. BACON. Let me give an illustration to the distinguished Senator from Maine, the force of which I think he will appreciate. suppose we all understand that the Senator from Maine regards it as an unheard-of proposition that in the present condition of affairs the independence of the Island of Cuba should be recognized. That is the emphatic statement in substance which he has frequently made in private and in this Chamber.

Mr. HALE. Hardly "unheard of," because we have heard a great deal of it.

Mr. BACON. Possibly I am in error in that, but that it would be an extremely improper thing to do. Mr. HALE. Not a wise thing to do.

Mr. BACON, Not a wise thing to do. The illustration I want to submit to the Senator is this: We are at amity with Spain. We hold all the relations with her that we hold with other civilized nations with which we are at peace. There is no doubt about the fact that Spain has a title to the Island of Cuba; that as it now stands it is an integral part of her territory; that it is subject to her sovereignty.

There are distinguished gentlemen who are members of this Congress who are eminently fit to be President, who, by experience and capacity, are recognized by the country as fit for that office, who think that the Island of Cuba ought to be recognized as an independent country. Suppose that one of these gentlemen was in the Presidential office. The condition of affairs exists as it does now, and on the 4th of March Congress adjourns. That President, thinking directly opposite from the manner in which the distinguished Senator from Maine thinks in the present condition. dition of affairs, immediately upon the adjournment of Congress recognizes the Island of Cuba as an independent republic under these circumstances, where there is so little to justify it, as there is in the opinion of the Senator from Maine.

Now, here is this Government having amicable relations with the Government of Spain. Here is this great lawmaking power invested with all the attributes of sovereignty except and saving the single attribute of exercising the pardoning power. comes back here in December and the condition of affairs has not changed. There is still the great want of evidence as to whether independence in the Island of Cuba would be proper that there is now. Under those circumstances, if every Senator in this Chamber and every member of the House of Representatives thought that the President had done wrong, if they thought that it had been an outrage on Spain, that Spain was still legit mately entitled to rule over that island, will the Senetar from Meineaus that the to rule over that island, will the Senator from Maine say that the action of that President would be final and that the lips of every Senator and every Representative would be closed and dumb, and that the matter could never be reversed?

that the matter could never be reversed?

Mr. HALE. In a case like the one the Senator has given, applied to Cuba, or as it has been applied to other people seeking recognition, if the President formally receives a minister, as has been done in the history of this Government, and he comes to Washington, and the President in return sends an agent duly accredited by him to that power, I should say that any case against the recognition of that people would be practically hopeless, and that no instance would ever be found where under such circumstances that recognition will be reversed. The history of every precedent shows exactly what the presumption is, that the Executive will be conservative in his action; and when he does what the Senator himself has put as a President doing, and all the accompanying acts go with it, I should say that when in December Congress assembles there never will a case arise where that recognitions. Congress assembles there never will a case arise where that recognition will be taken back.

Mr. BACON. I do not agree with the Senator in that proposi-tion. I am inclined to think that if the position were reversed, and the Senator had the same view as he has now of the right of Cuba to be recognized as an independent government, and if a President should assume to exercise that great sovereign power in the name of this Government, the distinguished Senator from Maine, while I doubt not the honesty and sincerity of the present expression of what he would anticipate, would be one of the first to assert the power of the department of the Government in which all these great powers of sovereignty have been lodged, and to say to the President, "You shall not do this great wrong to a country with which this Government is at peace, and it shall be reversed;" and that it would be a legal action I have not the shadow of a doubt so far as my limited ability as a lawyer permits me to judge of it.

Mr. HALE. Go still further in my theory of acquiescence in recognition. If it followed that by the action of the Executive in recognizing a province of a country with which we were at peace war ensued between that country and this country because of such recognition, no instance would be found where there would not be (while it would be called and believed to be a calamity) a disposition to sustain the Government in the war that followed.

I should regret it

Mr. BACON. We would all stand by the Government, of course, in case of war.

Mr. HALE. Everybody would regret it; but the acquiescence would be such that if war came we would pursue the war and maintain the honor of the country; and if war did not come I should look upon the case as hopeless after the recognition.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I beg the indulgence of the Senate only a few minutes. I have occupied very much longer time than I anticipated, but of course it has not all been consumed by me.

I think I may say that if neither in the prior exercise of this power by the executive department, nor in the writings and diplomatic correspondence of the officers of that department, nor in the decisions of the courts there has been a settlement of this question, it then stands now for determination by the test of argument upon it then stands now for determination by the test of argument upon the constitutional grant of power. It is not a question for determination by precedents, because there are no controlling precedents, and it must be decided on original constitutional principles.

Mr. President, the fact is not to be disguised that the actual exercise of power by the executive branch of the Government in this day far exceeds the bounds set for it by the Constitution. The correspondence in relative position of a president in a republic and of a king in a monarchy; the glamour of a great office in which one man among 70,000,000 is chosen as the sole head of a great department of the Government, while in the other departments the honors are divided among many; the gigantic measure of patronage and removal where he seems to have unlimited power to bestow, or to withhold, or to take away—these and other influences combine to elevate in the popular mind the prerogatives of the President far above the point fixed for them in the Constitution.

It is a remarkable fact that in England, a monarchy, the constant progress has been toward restraint of executive power and the enlargement of the power of the legislative branch of the Gov-ernment, until now practically all political power is in the con-trol of the elected representatives of the people. It is a fact still more remarkable that in the United States, designed distinctively as a representative republic, there has been a no less steady prog-ress in the direction of the absorption of power by the Executive and its practical surrender by Congress.

Mr. President, this is a most vital question. Its great importance is not due to the fact that it has arisen out of the progress of the Cuban question, or that its determination may affect the future of Cuba. Its chief importance is because it concerns the proper of Cuba. Its chief importance is because it concerns the proper exercise of the great functions of our Government, and because its decision is to affect the future of the American people. With this arrogant avowal and assumption of power, with this outspoken deflance of law when duly enacted, silence on the floor of Congress invites further encroachment by the executive department. Acquiescence by Congress in such encroachment is to encourage and increase the growth and exercise of the great oneman power, which the framers of the Constitution studiously sought to deny to the executive head. They set bounds to the great powers with which they invested him, and there is no more binding obligation on Congress than to see to it that he does not binding obligation on Congress than to see to it that he does not pass them.

The history of the struggles of centuries to free the peoples of the earth from the domination of one-man power is the world's history of the struggle of all mankind for liberty.

The great struggle of centuries has been to free the people from the domination of one-man power. The culmination and triumph in that struggle was typified in the formation of this Government. So long as the executive head is confined in the exercise of power to these bounds set for him by the organic law, there can be no to these bounds set for him by the organic law, there can be no one-man domination.

one-man domination.

To guard and fortify against the growth of power centered in one man, which all experience had shown to be aggressive and dangerous, the legislative is, under the Constitution, made the highest branch of this Government. While it is in no manner answerable to either of the other branches of Government, on the contrary all officers of all other branches of the Government are answerable to Congress as to a tribunal of final power. The great governmental functions, the exercise of the great powers of the sovereignty of the Government, have been committed to it by the sovereignty of the Government, have been committed to it by the Constitution with the particular design and intent that they shall not be exercised by the Executive; that, at great cost of blood and treasure, wrested as they had been from the grasp of kings, these great powers should never be again within the control of any one man.

The fundamental purpose was to elevate the people rather than to exalt any man who of necessity should be set up to rule. The supreme design was that their commands should be executed by him, rather than that they should be subjected to his will, "to the end, that this may be a government of laws and not of men."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. Browning, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 1448) to withdraw from the Supreme Court jurisdiction of criminal cases not capital, and confer the same on the circuit courts of appeals;

A bill (S. 3050) to validate the appointments, acts, and services of certain deputy United States marshals in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; and A bill (S. 3210) granting a pension to Anna P. Johnson.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills:

A bill (S.1646) providing for certain requirements for vessels propelled by gas, fluid, naphtha, or electric motors; and

A bill (S. 1726) to approve and ratify the construction of a bridge across the Red River, between the States of Arkansas and Texas, at a point above the town of Fulton, in Arkansas, on said river, built by the Texarkana Northern Railway Company, but now owned and operated by the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company, and to authorize the latter company to maintain said bridge over said waterway, subject to certain stipulations and conditions.

SULPHUR RIVER BRIDGE, IN ARKANSAS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1722) to approve and ratify the construction of a bridge across the Sulphur River, in the State of Arkansas, by the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company, which was, on page 3, after section 4, to insert:

SEC. 5. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date of approval thereof.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate disagree to that amendment and ask for a conference with the House of Representatives.

Mr. BATE. What is the bill?

Mr. FRYE. It is a bridge bill, and the House of Representatives put on an amendment providing that the building of the bridge must be commenced within one year and completed within three years, when the bridge is already in existence.

Mr. BATE. Do I understand that the bridge is located in Arkenese?

kansas?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine, that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives and ask for a conference with the House thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. Vest, Mr. Nelson, and Mr. Berry were appointed.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate adjourn.
The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 14, 1897, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 13, 1897.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, House bill No. 2668 was erroneously referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, as it is a bill for the amendment of the existing tariff law, and by direction of the committee I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

There was no objection, and the change of reference was made. AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported the bill (H. R. 9961) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the year ending June 30, 1898, and moved that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. DOCKERY and Mr. RICHARDSON asked to have all points of order reserved.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with all points of order reserved.

TENNESSEE CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the Senate joint resolution (S. R. 189) which is now on the Clerk's desk.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to solicit proposals and to contract for the erection of the building for the Government exhibit at the Tennessee Centennial Exposition authorized by the act of Congress approved December 22, 1896, without public advertisement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this joint resolution?

Mr. BAILEY. I reserve the right to object, Mr. Speaker. I take it that this joint resolution is intended merely to expedite the construction of the building, and does not increase the appropriate the construction of the building, and does not increase the appropriate the second to the second that the secon priation or authorize the Secretary to contract beyond the amount priation or authorize the Secretary to contract beyond the amount of the appropriation already made.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman, I will state that this joint resolution does not change the bill as it passed here some days ago in any particular whatever. It does not increase the appropriation nor authorize the Secretary to contract beyond the $30,000 appropriated in the bill. It simply allows him to advertise for a shorter time than is now required by law. The resolution was introduced at the request of the Secretary for the reason that the exposition will open on the 1st day of May next, and if he is compelled to advertise for thirty days for tenders for the construction of this buildopen on the 1st day of May next, and if he is compened to advertise for thirty days for tenders for the construction of this building, it can not be completed and ready for the opening. The Secretary will advertise all the same, but for a shorter time, and will communicate with all the persons who are accustomed to take contracts for the erection of Government buildings.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was recordingly read the third time, and personal times are contracted.

accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WASHINGTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the

PHILLIP KIRSHNER.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill No. 3851, to reimburse Col. Phillip Kirschner for money paid for the services of a band for the Sixteenth Regiment of Ohio Infantry Volunteers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and directed to reimburse and pay to Col. Phillip Kirschner the sum of $388.52, with interest thereon from August 6, 1866, for money paid by him as a commissioned officer in the Army for the services of a band for the Sixteenth Regiment of Ohio Infantry Volunteers during the war, on proper proof of the payment of the said sum by said Kirschner duly submitted to and approved by the auditing or accounting officer of the Treasury, which sum is hereby appropriated for the purpose out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. McMILLIN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have the report read, or else a statement of the merits of the bill.

Mr. CORLISS. The report explains the matter in detail, and I ask that it be read.

The report (by Mr. SNOVER) was read, as follows:

ask that it be read.

The report (by Mr. SNOVER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8851) to reimburse Col. Phillip Kirshner for money paid for the services of a band for the Sixteenth Regiment of Ohio Infantry Volunteers, respectfully report that a careful examination of this claim shows the following facts:

That Col. Phillip Kirshner responded to the President's proclamation of April 15, 1881, and enlisted and became captain of Company E, Sixteenth Ohio (three months) Infantry, on April 23, 1881, and served until August 18, 1881, on which latter date his company was mustered out of service. The army records further show that he reenlisted in the service October 13, 1881, as major of the Sixteenth Ohio Infantry Volunteers, and served in the Army until October 31, 1884, receiving the rank of colonel for distinguished service. It also appears from the army records that the band of Company E, Sixteenth Ohio Infantry, was enlisted April 23, 1861, at Springfield, Ohio, and continued in service until August 18, 1881.

This claim is for money paid by Col. Phillip Kirshner upon a judgment obtained against him for services of the band rendered to the Sixteenth Ohio Infantry in the services of the Government, which he, in connection with other commissioned officers, engaged and became responsible for their services, at a price exceeding that which was afterwards allowed by the Government. It appears that on July 22, 1861, an act was passed by Congress authorizing the engagement of bands and fixing the compensation for such services.

By an act approved July 31, 1861, the Secretary of War was authorized and directed to refund, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the volunteers called out by the President's proclamation of the 18th of April, 1861, such amounts of money as may have been expended by said volunteers in the employment of regimental or company bands during the period of their service under said proclamation.

It would seem from the forth the terms of the contract and the reasons for the nonpayment of the full amount thereof by the Government.

It also appears, to the satisfaction of the committee, that the reason for the long delay in the presentation of this claim arose from the fact that Colonel Kirshner, until within a few years, has had ample private means, and did not intend to call upon the Government until forced by adverse circumstances and blindness to ask for this relief. The claimant is at the present time blind, and in financial distress, and your committee recommend that the bill for his relief do pass, with the following amendments:

Amend by striking out lines 5 and 6 and the words "and sixty-six," in line 7, and substitute therefor "$337.52."

The letter "c" in Kirshner's name appears to be a clerical error, and should also be stricken out.

Mr. McMILLIN. I notice that there are several amendments provided for. Am I correct in understanding that the item for interest is stricken out?

Mr. CORLISS. Yes, sir; on the recommendation of the com-

Mr. McMILLIN. It appears from the report that this man was authorized to make the employment.

Mr. CORLISS. A large number of similar claims were paid, but Colonel Kirshner never expected to have to call for the payment of this claim.

Mr. McMILLIN. But it was a liability of the Government under the law existing at that time.

Mr. CORLISS. It so appeared to the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, there is quite a number of these claims, and although I have no objection to their merit, I do not think they ought to be passed by unanimous consent; so I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Subsequently
Mr. COX withdrew his objection.
The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that he will be disposed hereafter to regard objections as final

There being no further objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be amended as proposed.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. CORLISS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BARZILLA C. HUDSON.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2253) for the relief of Barzilla C. Hudson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Barzilla C. Hudson, late of Battery D, Fourth United States Artillery, and grant him an honorable discharge.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. PARKER) was read, as follows:

The report (by Mr. Parker) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2253) for the relief of Barzilla C. Hudson, having considered the same, recommend that the bill do pass with amendment.

This is a bill to remove the charge of desertion and grant an honorable discharge.

Amend by adding "to date May 26, 1865: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other allowance shall become due or payable by virtue of this act."

This is a similar case to that of John H. Willis (H. R. 4379), already reported favorably. These soldiers served from April 22, 1861, to May 28, 1865, having been meanwhile transferred to the regular artillery and reenlisted. They insisted that they understood they were not to stay after the war. Hudson swears his captain told him he could not discharge him, but he could go home.

The report of a like bill at the last Congress (Fifty-third, third session, Report 1663) is as follows:

"Barzilla C. Hudson enlisted in Company K, Thirteenth Indiana Volunteers, on April 22, 1861, to serve three years.

"On the 9th day of November, 1862, he was honorably discharged from this service for the purpose of enlisting in Battery D, Fourth United States Artillery, in accordance with General Order, No. 154, of the War Department. The object of the order was to recruit the artillery service from the ranks of the Volunteer Army.

"His service in the Thirteenth Indiana Volunteers was honorable and faithful.

"He immediately enlisted in Battery D, Fourth United States Artillery, for the unexpired term of Company K. Thirteenth Lates Artillery, for the unexpired term of Company K. Thirteenth Lates Artillery, for the unexpired term of Company K. Thirteenth Lates Artillery, for the unexpired term of Company K. Thirteenth Lates Artillery, for the unexpired term of Company K. Thirteenth Lates Artillery, for the unexpired term of Company K. Thirteenth Lates Artillery, for the unexpired term of Company K. Thirteenth Lates Artillery, for the unexpired term of Company K. The cont faithful.

"He immediately enlisted in Battery D, Fourth United States Artillery, for the unexpired term of Company K, Thirteenth Indiana Volunteers, and served to the end of that term, and was discharged therefrom January 31, 1864. He again enlisted the following day in Battery D, Fourth United States Artillery, and served until May 26, 1865, when he is reported as having deserted.

"His entire term of service covers a period from April 22, 1861, until May 26, 1865, during all of which time he was faithful and prompt in the discharge of his duties.

"It will be remembered that at the date of his alleged desertion the war was practically closed. The volunteer armies were disintegrating, and thousands of the volunteer seldiers returned to their homes without the formality of a discharge. He would be entitled to his discharge upon these facts had he served entirely in the Volunteer Army, but having been transferred to the United States troops, the general law does not cover his case.

"It is a fact well known that the ranks of the Regular Army were greatly depleted, and that the service in the artillery was extrahazardous, and that his enlistment in that service was of no advantage to him, but rather a favor to the Government. The fact that he enlisted in the volunteer service during the war would justify the impression which he seems to have had that his term of service was limited to that war. He says that he so understood it, and that he only followed the example of others in that respect.

"He is a man of good reputation and returned immediately to his home and gave no evidence of any intention to avoid detection, but has remained continuously at his home up to this date.

"Under all these facts, your committee think the charge of desertion should be removed."

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. OVERSTREET, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

COGSWELL & CO.

Mr. COBB. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 939) for the relief of Cogswell & Co.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to reopen the refunding claim of Cogswell & Co., of St. Louis, Mo., for $1.306, which claim is now on file in his office, to examine it, and allow so much thereof as he may find to have been paid in excess of the amount required by law; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to pay such amount as is allowed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COBB, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

HARRIET F. HERRICK.

I ask unanimous consent for the present consid-Mr. MOODY. eration of the bill (H. R. 2859) granting a pension to Harriet F. Herrick.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, at $12 per month, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Harriet F. Herrick, of Beverly, State of Massachusetts, widow of Moses S. Herrick, deceased, late a member of Company E, Eighth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. CROWTHER. Reserving the right to object, I should like to hear an explanation.

Mr. MOODY. Let the report be read, and I think that will satisfy every gentleman of the justice of the bill.

The report (by Mr. POOLE) was read, as follows:

The report (by Mr. Poole) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2899) granting a pension to Harriet F. Herrick, report as follows:

Moses S. Herrick, husband of the beneficiary of this bill, enlisted April 30, 1861, and was mustered in as fourth lieutenant Company E, Eighth Massachusetts Volunteer Militia Infantry. He was honorably discharged May 20, 1861, on surgeon's certificate of disability on account of amputation of right leg near the ankle, for gunshot wound of foot received while quartered in the Rotunda of the Capitol at Washington, in consequence of the fall of a stack of loaded muskets. The evidence does not show that soldier's death was due to service. The claim under act of June 27, 1890, was rejected because soldier did not serve ninety days. He could not, because he lost his foot in line of duty. This case comes clearly within the class where it is the province of this committee to recommend and of the Congress to render relief, and the passage of the bill is recommended. The widow is 60 years old, and was married to the soldier in 1852. She owns a small house and lot which she occupies, has no other property, and depends upon her daily labor for support.

There being no objection the House proceeded to the consider.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MOODY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

HENRY MACKRILL.

Mr. HATCH. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3690) restoring a pension to Henry Mackvill, alias Henry Macky.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place or reinstate on the pension roll the name of Henry Mackvill, alias Henry Mackey, a late landsman in the United States naval service during the war of the rebellion, and cause him to be paid a pension of §15 per month on account of catarrh, disease of rectum, disease of kidneys, and disease of eyes, and necessary results thereof, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as fol-

Strike out the words "or reinstate" in line 4; substitute the name "Mackrill" for "Mackvill" in line 5; strike out the word "fifteen" in line 7 and insert "twelve" in line thereof, and strike out all after the word "month," in line 8.

Also amend the title of bill so as to read: "Granting a pension to Henry Mackrill, alias Henry Mackey."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DOCKERY. I suggest that the report be read; or very lengthy, that the gentleman make a statement.

The report (by Mr. Kirkpatrick) was read, as follows: I suggest that the report be read; or, if it is

The report (by Mr. KIRKPATRICK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3690) granting a pension to Henry Mackrill, alias Henry Mackey, late landsman in the United States Navy, having carefully considered all the facts and circumstances presented, respectfully report as follows:

The Auditor for the Navy Department says:

"Henry Mackrill, landsman, enlisted at the naval station at Chicago, and was entered on the rolls of the Princeton January 23, 1864, and served to March 3, 1864; on the Theonderoga to May 4, 1895, as landsman; on the Princeton as ordinary seaman to May 11, 1865, and was discharged from the Sabine as ordinary seaman August 3, 1865. The rolls do not show anything in reference to his being a Confederate prisoner or having served in the Confederate army."

ence to his being a Confederate prisoner or having served in the Confederate army."

The War Department records show:

"Henry Mackrill, private, Company D, Ninth Mississippi Infantry, Confederate States army, enlisted April 11, 1862, at Vicksburg, Miss., for three years, and is reported on rolls to August 31, 1863, 'present.' October 31, 1863, 'absent, sick since October 20, 1863, by order Surgeon Williams.' December 31, 1863, 'absent, missing in action since day after Missionary Ridge, November 25, 1863. Reported as deserter.' Name not found on rolls of later date. Nature of disability not stated. Prisoner-of-war records show Henry Mackeral, Company D, Ninth Mississippi Infantry, captured at Chickamauga, Tenn., November 26, 1863. Confined at Rock Island, Ill., December 13, 1863, where he enlisted in the United States Navy, and sent to naval rendezvous, Camp Douglas, Ill., January 25, 1864."

Claimant alleges that at breaking out of the war he was a British subject and engaged in cutting wood on the Lower Mississippi: that the floods washed his wood away, and it was impracticable to get any work or even anything to eat unless he enlisted, and under the pressure of his surroundings he enlisted in the Confederate States army, intending to get away at first opportunity, which came at battle of Mission Ridge, when he and eight others surrendered to one Union soldier.

When he enlisted in the United States Navy he asked to have his name put on rolls as "Henry Mackey," for fear that he might be taken prisoner; but this was not done. After the war he was known as Henry Mackey; had the legislature of Indiana change his name to Henry Mackey; became a naturalized citizen under that name, and has been known as Henry Mackey ever since.

He applied for pension under act of June 27, 1890 (filed July 4, 1890), and since.

He applied for pension under act of June 27, 1890 (filed July 4, 1890), and again May 9, 1891, and with the latter an affidavit stating his prior Confederate service. His pension was allowed October 2, 1891, at $12 per month from July 25, 1890, for "catarrh. disease of rectum, kidneys, and eyes."

He was dropped from the rolls for "disloyalty" September 23, 1895, under authority of section 4716, Revised Statutes, having voluntarily aided or abetted the rebellion against the authority of the United States.

There is no question in this case but that the applicant is disabled for performing manual labor. The board of examining surgeons at Delhi, Ind. July 15, 1891, rated him four-eighteenths for nervous debility, six-eighteenths for post-nasal catarrh, two-eighteenths for disease of eyes, four-eighteenths for kidneys, and four-eighteenths for ples, and his disabilities have progressed since then.

The construction of the act of June 27, 1890, which prevailed several months without objection, while the Congress which enacted it was still in session, that ninety days' service and an honorable discharge without regard to previous loyalty were the prerequisites to a pensionable status under that act, gave this sailor a pension, to which your committee believe he was justly entitled, he having faithfully served more than one and one-half years and being honorably discharged.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendments:

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendments:

Strike out the words "or reinstate "in line 4; substitute the name "Mackrill" for "Mackvill" in line 5; strike out the word "fifteen "in line 7 and insert "twelve" in line 4 the theory, and strike out all after the word "morth" in line 8.

In the 8.

Also amend the title of bill so as to read: "Granting a pension to Henry Mackrill, alias Henry Mackey."

Mr. DOCKERY. I wish to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill how long this applicant was in the Confederate service.

Mr. HATCH. About a year or a little over. He was in the Union service a year and a half. The fact is that he was in a starving condition when he joined the Confederate army; and at the first conceptuality he igned the Union Army. After the war the first opportunity he joined the Union Army. After the war he received a pension, which was granted notwithstanding his own statement that he had been in the Confederate army. After receiving that pension for some years he was last year stricken off the rolls on account of it having been found that he had served on the rolls on account of it having been found that he had served in the Confederate army.

Mr. DOCKERY. Has this bill been unanimously recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions?

Mr. HATCH. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOCKERY. I shall not interpose any objection if it is the policy of the other side to pension ex-Confederates with a record when he is shown by the properties this case.

such as is shown by the report in this case.

Mr. LOUD. This case may have some merits; but I do not think it has such extraordinary merit that it should be passed by unanimous consent. Let it take its turn on the Calendar. There are other bills there which have equal merit.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the bill is not before the House.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9671) to detach the county of Marion from the northern division of the northern district of Alabama and attach the same to the southern division of said district.

Be it enacted, etc., That the county of Marion, in the State of Alabama, be, and the same is hereby, detached from the northern division of the northern judicial district of the State of Alabama and attached to the southern division of said northern judicial district.

SEC. 2. That all process, civil and criminal, hereafter issued against persons residing in said county of Marion shall be made returnable to the courts held at Birmingham, in the State of Alabama; and all suits and prosecutions now pending in the circuit or district courts of the United States against persons residing in the said county of Marion, at the city of Huntsville, in said State, shall be determined in said courts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this

Mr. PAYNE. Let us have some explanation of it.
Mr. BANKHEAD. The report is very short, and I will ask that the Clerk read it.

The report (by Mr. CONNOLLY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 19671) to detach the county of Marion from the northern division of the northern district of Alabama and attach the same to the southern division of said district, report:

The sole purpose of the bill is to transfer the county of Marion from the northern to the southern division of the northern district of the State of Alabama. It affects no public interest, except in so far as it concerns the single county of Marion, and it appears to the committee that by reason of proximity to the place of holding the court and directness of routes of travel litigants of the county of Marion will be better accommodated in the southern than in the northern division of said northern district, and as we have had no objections to said bill presented, we therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. HENDERGON.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will state to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] that this matter has been carefully examined by a subcommittee

Mr. PAYNE. The bill seems to be all right. I am not disposed to object to it.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BANKHEAD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

This is a bill enacting that the records of the War Department be so amended as to remove the charge of "mutiny, conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman, and disobedience and deflance of orders from his superior officers" from the record of Second Lieut. David Sample, late of Company E, Fifteenth Michigan Infantry Volunteers, and that an honorable discharge be granted to the said David Sample, with all the pay and other emoluments due him at the time of discharge from the service.

The beneficiary of this bill, David Sample, who was a second lieutenant in Company E, Fifteenth Michigan Infantry Volunteers, was, on or about the 8d day of July, 1865, stationed with his regiment at or near Devalls Bluff, Ark.
On this same day, July 3, Sample and Lieutenant McBride, of the same regiment, were walking about the town of Devalls Bluff, and coming to a bowling alley they went in and played a game of tenpins. After this they went upstairs to a saloon to get a drink. It seems there were quite a number of other soldiers in the saloon at the time, and the provost guard came in to arrest one, Lieutenant Autenreith, who was in the saloon. There was a good deal of ill feeling between the soldiers who were in the saloon and the provost guards, who were new troops, and the question was raised, according to the testimony, as to whether the guard could arrest an officer without written authority. It further appears that Lieutenant Autenreith resisted arrest, and after the party had gone out of doors he (Autenreith) was knocked down by a blow from the guard before he would submit to an arrest. Sample asked the guard refused, which resulted in an angry altercation, in which Sample took part, and the result was that he (Sample) was arrested and taken to the guardh

Sample took part, and the result was that he (Sample) was arrested and taken to the guardhouse.

Charges were subsequently preferred against Sample for "mutiny, conduct unbecoming an officer and gentleman, burglary, and disobedience and defiarce of orders from his superior officers." He was tried by a court-martial, found guilty of the charges, except the charge of burglary, and was sentenced to be dishonorably dismissed from the service, with forfeiture of all pay and allowances, and the sentence was approved and carried out. Sample's record as a soldier is an enviable and most honorable one. He was enfolled as a private early in 1861, and gave four years of honest and faithful service to this country. He participated in the battles of Shiloh, Vicksburg, Missionary Ridge, Atlanta, and was with Sherman on his historic march to the sea. He was also through the campaigns in North and South Carolina which culminated in Johnston's surrender, and everywhere his gallantry and efficiency were highly recommended. His colonel, Fred S. Hutchinson, pays him the highest compliments for bravery and efficiency, and says that the bill for his relief is only a matter of the simplest justice, and ought to pass. In view of the fact that the war was over at the time the offense was committed, and that Sample's previous record was especially meritorious, your committee are of opinion that the bill ought to pass.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Michigan which may obviate objection to the consideration of the bill at this time. If this person had been a consideration of the bill at this time. It this person had been a private soldier, he would have been punished by imprisonment. The bill proposes to return to him all the pay and allowances due, and which were withheld. Now, if the gentleman would strike out those words by an amendment, and provide that no pay or allowances shall become due by reason of the act, I am performed that it shall be considered now.

willing, so far as I am concerned, that it shall be considered now.
Mr. SPALDING. Very well, Mr. Speaker; I am willing that that should be done. The purpose of the bill is simply to give this man an honorable discharge.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill as proposed to be amended?

Mr. STEELE. Let us hear how it will read as amended.

The bill was read as proposed to be amended.

Mr. DOCKERY. That does not cover exactly the ground. The amendment should be appended to the bill that no pay, emoluments, or allowances shall become due or payable by reason of the passage of this act. I mean, to insert the usual proviso in such

Mr. SPALDING. I have no objection to that.
The SPEAKER. Then the proposition is to amend the bill?
Mr. SPALDING. Yes, sir; by inserting the usual provision that it will not entitle the beneficiary to the receipt of emoluments or allowance

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.
Mr. DOCKERY. Now, let the Clerk report the amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

In line 10, after the words "David Sample," strike out the following words, "with all the pay and other emoluments due him at the time of discharge for all services," and insert "Provided, That no pay, emoluments, or allowances be made to the said David Sample."

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed. On motion of Mr. SPALDING, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

RIGHT OF WAY THROUGH THE INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House proceed now to the consideration of Senate bill 1741, to authorize the Muskogee, Oklahoma and Western Railroad Company to construct and operate a line of railway through Oklahoma and the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, and that the House bill on the same subject be ordered to lie upon the table. The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Speaker, this bill, I will state, is in the usual form of all bills of a similar character granting rights of way, and unless the reading be insisted upon I ask to dispense with it.

Mr. PANNE. Is this a bridge bill?

Mr. PAYNE. Is this a bridge bill?
Mr. DINSMORE. No, a right of way for a railroad company.
Mr. PAYNE. Through the Indian Territory?
Mr. DINSMORE. Yes, sir.
Mr. PAYNE. Is there still room there for another railroad? [Laughter.

Mr. DINSMORE. I think so.
Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman is satisfied with that fact, I shall not interpose objection. But it seems to me that we have been granting a very great number of rights of way there.

Mr. DINSMORE. I can assure the gentleman from personal knowledge that there is enough room for this one.

Mr. STEELE. What is the width of the proposed right of way?
Mr. DINSMORE. One hundred feet.
I will state that I introduced the same bill in the House, which was favorably considered by the House Committee on Indian Affairs and placed upon the Calendar. The Senate has passed a similar bill, identical in terms, and I now ask unanimous consent to lay the House bill on the table and take up for consideration the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?
There was no objection; and the House bill (H. R. 5486) of the same title was ordered to lie on the table.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.
The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.
Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Speaker, I think my request or statement a few moments ago was misapprehended. I asked to dispense with the reading of the bill. I made the statement that it is in the usual form of all such bills heretofore passed by the House.
The SPEAKER. Is there objection to omitting the reading of the bill, which the gentleman states is in the usual form?
There was no objection.

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, it was passed.

On motion of Mr. DINSMORE, a motion to reconsider the last. vote was laid on the table.

SURG. P. M. RIXEY.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 133, authoriz-ing Surg. P. M. Rixey, of the Navy, to accept from the King of Spain the grand cross of naval merit with the white distinction mark, in recognition of services rendered to the officer and sailors of the Santa Maria who were injured by an explosion on that ship.
The bill was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That Surg. P. M. Rixey, of the United States Navy, be, and is hereby, authorized to accept the grand cross of naval merit with the white distinction mark, conferred upon him by the King of Spain in recognition of the services rendered by that officer to an officer and sailors of the Santa Maria injured by an explosion on that ship in New York Harbor.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BOUTELLE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ANNA P. JOHNSON.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3210) granting a pension to Anna P. Johnson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll of the United States the name of Anna P. Johnson, widow of Paul Johnson, late a private in Company I, Sixteenth Iowa Volunteers, at the rate of $12 per month.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Speaker, pending the reading of the report, I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. Baker of Kansas) was read, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. Baker of Kansas) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1728) granting a pension to Anna P. Johnson, widow of Paul Johnson, late private Company I, Sixteenth Iowa Volunteer Infantry, at $12 per month, having carefully examined and considered the same, respectfully report:

The War Department records show:

"Paul Johnson was drafted into service and received at draft rendezvous, Davenport, Iowa, November 5, 1864; forwarded to regiment December 5, 1864; assigned as private Company I, Sixteenth Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and delivered at headquarters Provisional Division of the Cumberland, Nashville, Tenn., December 28, 1864, with acute rheumatism, and was transferred January 2, 1865; admitted to Seclewick General Hospital, Louisville, Nashville, Tenn., December 28, 1864, with acute rheumatism, and was transferred January 2, 1865; admitted to Seclewick General Hospital, Louisville, Ky., January 20, 1865; admitted to Seclewick General Hospital, March 14, 1885; entered Brown Hospital, Louisville, Ky., March 14, 1895, convalescent from fever.

"Medical records also show that a man described as Paul Johnson, Company —, Ninth Iowa Cavalry, or Infantry, was admitted to Clay General Hospital, Louisville, Ky., April 71, 1865, with insanity, and transferred May 18, 1885. He is reported deserted from Brown General Hospital, Louisville, Ky., April 71, 1865, with insanity, and transferred May 18, 1865. On motion of Mr. UPDEGRAFF, the corresponding House bill (H. R. 7128) was ordered to lie on the table.

EDWARD H. MURRELL

Mr. OTEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1590) for the relief of Edward H. Murrell

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Edward H. Murrell the sum of $1,409.34, said amount having been collected by the Treasury agents of the United States from property in New Orleans, La., belonging to him, and by them turned over to the Treasury Department.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

of the bill?

Mr. PAYNE. Let the report be read.

Mr. OTEY. Mr. Speaker, I should like just to say a word or two on this bill. This is to pay a gentleman by the name of E. H. Murrell, who is a resident of the city of Lynchburg, Va., and has never changed his domicile, but who had property in New Orleans at the surrender of the city to General Butler. In the cartel of surrender private property was to be respected. He had some property there which he had leased. A Treasury agent took charge of that property, collected the rent, and covered it into the Treasury. He asks that this money be paid him. He had the papers from New Orleans and came here for the purpose of collecting the money. His overcoat, in which the papers were, was stolen, and he was thereby prevented from getting the money at that time. The Supreme Court has decided the case of the Planters' Bank, exactly similar to this, and I hope that there will be no objection to the bill. It has passed the Senate twice. It has been reported by two committees of this House unanimously, and comes here now unanimously reported by the committee. and comes here now unanimously reported by the committee. Here is the report.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I think this case ought to take the regular course. I shall have to object.
Mr. OTEY. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] to hear the report read.

Mr. PAYNE. I will read the report. It is useless to take up the time of the House with the reading of the report now.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

JOSEPH A. BLANCHARD.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6686) to correct the military record of Joseph A. Blanchard, late first lieutenant of Troop E, First New York Mounted Rifles.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to correct the military record of Joseph A. Blanchard, late first lieutenant of Troop E, First New York Mounted Rifles, and to grant him an honorable discharge, to date from July 23, 1864.

The Committee on Military Affairs recommended the following amendment:

Add to the bill the following:
"Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other allowances shall become due and payable by reason of the passage of this act."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DOCKERY. Let the report be read.
Mr. LOUD. It would be better to have the report read, Mr.

Mr. DOCKERY. I understand the report is of some length, and a brief statement will probably be satisfactory.

Mr. PITNEY. I can make a statement that I think will satisfy gentlemen who are interested in this matter.

gentiemen who are interested in this matter.

This bill is to remove not a charge of desertion, but a dishonorable dismissal of the soldier, which was ordered without notice, trial, hearing, or opportunity to be heard, and without reasonable cause. The soldier enlisted on the 24th of July, 1861, as a private in Company A, First New York Mounted Rifles, to serve three years. He served for that period without a blemish on his record, and was promoted, on his own merits, through the several grades of corporal sergeant, and first sergeant to second lieutenent. and was promoted, on his own merits, through the several grades of corporal, sergeant, and first sergeant, to second lieutenant and first lieutenant. He was first lieutenant when the expiration of his three years' term arrived. He then tendered his resignation on the ground that the term of his enlistment had expired. He was informed, in response, that his commission as a first lieutenant bound him in the service for an additional term of three years. To that he replied, in writing, stating that when he accepted the commission as first lieutenant he did not understand that he was bound for an additional term of three years; but, on the contrary, was assured that it made no difference; that he would not be bound beyond the original term. He thereupon again replied by tendering his resignation in writing, explaining his understanding at the time of his commission. Upon receipt of that communication his superior officer recommended that he be dishonorably discharged "for tendering his resignation in the face of the enemy;" and without notice or opportunity of explanation, without trial by court-martial or otherwise—

Mr. STEELE. I object.

Mr. STEELE. I object.
Mr. PITNEY. I have not finished my statement.
Mr. STEELE. But you have made enough statement for me to object.

Mr. PITNEY. I hope the gentleman will be courteous enough to allow me to finish my statement before he objects.

Mr. STEELE. I have no objection to that, but I will object to

Mr. PITNEY. If the gentleman will permit me, I should like to complete my statement. On the day the news of this officer's dismissal reached the command in which he had served a written testimonial was prepared, which I have on my desk, and a copy of which is appended to the committee's report. It was signed by all the other officers, except the one who had recommended his dismissal, and expressed their desire to testify to "his uniform centlements conduct to his callentry and heaven and the redismissal, and expressed their desire to testify to "his uniform gentlemanly conduct, to his gallantry and bravery, and the undaunted courage which has characterized his career as a soldier for the past three years." Some of the signers of that testimonial I know personally, and they have told me that the dismissal of this man was an outrage, and I think that justice requires that he be given an honorable discharge at this time. If any punishment was required, he has been sufficiently punished by the odium which has rested upon him during all these years. He procured a receipt showing that he was not chargeable with any public property whatever. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will not object.

Mr. STEELE. I object to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

CAPT. BRADBURY W. HIGHT.

Mr. HAGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk. The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1949) granting an additional pension to Capt. Bradbury W. Hight. Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Bradbury W. Hight, late of Company C, Second Regiment Vermont Volunteer Infantry, at the rate of $72 per month, in lieu of his present pension of $17 per month.

Mr. LOUD. Let us have the report read. The report (by Mr. BAKER of Kansas) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1949) granting an increase of pension to $72 per month to Bradbury W. Hight, late captain Company C, Second Vermont Volunteer Infantry, having carefully examined and considered the facts presented, respectfully adopt the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions as embodying the salient features, and recommend the passage of the bill. The Senate committee's report is as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1949) granting an additional pension to Capt. Bradbury W. Hight, have examined the same, and report:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1949) granting an additional pension to Capt. Bradbury W. Hight, have examined the same, and report:

Claimant enlisted June 20, 1861, and was discharged for disability said to have been disease of the eyes June 29, 1884. He was pensioned June 28, 1866, at $7.50 per month for disease of eyes. Pension was increased November 17, 1895, to $15 per month for amaurosis, and it was further increased September 17, 1895, to $17. On January 15, 1895, soldier filed declaration for further increase, alleging total blindness, but the application was rejected by the Pension Bureau.

To properly understand this case, it is essential to keep in mind the fact that soldier was pensioned for amaurosis, which, according to Dunglison's Medical Dictionary, is—

"Diminution or complete loss of sight without any perceptible alteration in the organization of the eyes; generally owing to loss of power of the optic nerve or retina—from primary or degenerative atrophy of that nerve."

It will thus be seen that as long ago as November, 1884, soldier had a disease of the eyes, for which he was pensioned, that must inevitably result in total blindness sooner or later. It appears, further, that in about ten years thereafter it did so result in total blindness; and there seems to be no valid reason assigned why the pension was not then increased to the rate for total blindness, which is the amount asked for in this bill.

On the question of total blindness, it is only necessary to refer to the findings on the part of the medical officers of the Government. The medical examining board at Council Bluffs, Iowa, under date of January 25, 1895, closed its report in these words:

"He is totally and hopelessly blind, and can not distinguish light from darkness."

Another examination was made by the same board twelve days later, the

"He is totally and hopelessly blind, and can not darkness."

Another examination was made by the same board twelve days later, the closing paragraph of the report being as follows:

"Claimant is totally blind, and so incapacitated as to require the constant attendance of another person."

Apparently not content with this, an examination of the soldier was ordered to be made by Dr. H. Gifford, a distinguished coulist of Omaha, Nebr., on March 20, 1895, who reported:

"Patient is totally blind from glaucoma. Disability is total—of first degree."

Yatient is totally that the gree."
Your committee are unable to discover any reason for the rejection of this claim. It certainly must have been made upon a technical medical point too fine to be grasped by ordinary minds. They therefore recommend the passage of the bill, after being amended by striking out all after the word "month," in line 8, being a provision for the payment of arrears, which are never allowed by special act, and they also recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the preamble.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

A. B. PEDIGO.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to A. B. Pedigo, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $31.06 cents, the same being balance due for carrying United States mails in the State of Texas from October 1, 1800, to May 31, 1861.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. I there objection?
Mr. PAYNE. I hope the report will be read.
Mr. LOUD. Let us have the report read.
Mr. COOPER of Texas. I ask that the report be read, and the accompanying papers. They are a letter from the Auditor for the Post-Office and two affidavits.
The SPEAKER. Without objection, the report will be read.
The report (by Mr. HUTCHESON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1280) for the relief of A. B. Pedigo, submit the following report:

It has been shown to the satisfaction of your committee that A. B. Pedigo (the party seeking relief by this bill) was the mail contractor on Route No. 8610, Woodville to Beaumont, in the State of Texas, under a contract commencing July 1, 1853, and that he was paid in full to September 30, 1860, and that a balance is due him for service from October 1, 1830, to May 31, 1861, amounting to $331.06. Said sum of money has never been paid to him by the United States Government or the late Confederate States government, and during the late civil war the said A. B. Pedigo was a loyal citizen of the United States; wherefore your committee unanimously recommend that the bill do pass.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF AUDITOR FOR THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 27, 1898.

Sir: In reply to a verbal inquiry relative to the claim of Mr. A. B. Pedigo for carrying the mail in Texas in 1860, I have the honor to inform you that the records of this office show that A. B. Pedigo was the mail contractor on Route No. 8619, Woodville to Beaumont, in the State of Texas, under a contract commencing July 1, 1885; that he was paid in full to September 30, 1860, and that a balance stands to his credit for service from October 1, 1860, to May 31, 1861, the date to which service has been certified, amounting to $331.06. The record of payments made by the Confederate States government of claims of contractors for service performed prior to June 1, 1861, is found in a register which is incomplete, there being a number of leaves and parts of leaves missing; but so far as the record goes there is no evidence of any payment having been made to Mr. Pedigo by the Confederate States government for service under his contract with the United States.

Very respectfully,

Hon. S. B. Cooper, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

STATE OF TEXAS, County of Tyler:

I, A. B. Pedigo, a citizen of the State of Texas and county of Tyler, do solemnly swear that I have never received payment from the United States of America for carrying United States mails in the State of Texas from October I, 1860, to May 31, 1861, and that the Confederate States government never paid me for said mail service, and that the $331.06 is a just debt and has never been paid.

Sworn to and subscribed before me by A. B. Pedigo, well known to me, on this the 6th day of February, A. D. 1896.

W. E. ADAMS, A Notary Public Duly Qualified and Acting in and for Tyler County, Tex.

THE STATE OF TEXAS, County of Tyler: I, William S. Durham, a citizen of the State of Texas and county of Tyler, do solemnly swear that I am well acquainted with Mr. A. B. Pedigo, who is also a citizen of said State and county, and have been acquainted with him from the year 1860 up to the present date, and have always known him to be a loyal citizen of the United States of America.

W. S. DURHAM.

W. S. DURHAM.

Sworn to and subscribed before me, the undersigned notary public duly qualified and acting in and for Tyler County, Tex., on this the 6th day of February, A. D. 1896.

W. E. ADAMS, A Notary Public in and for Tyler County, Tex.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I think there is no finding of the Court of Claims that this man was loyal but the evidence of one man in general terms. I object.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. It is not the character of claim that can go to the Court of Claims, for that court has no jurisdiction of such cases

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

BRIDGE OVER THE ST. LOUIS RIVER BETWEEN THE STATES OF WISCONSIN AND MINNESOTA.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9752) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a steel bridge over the St. Louis River between the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota," approved April 24, 1894, as amended by an act approved August 4, 1894, entitled "An act to amend an act to authorize the construction of a steel bridge over the St. Louis River between the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin."

The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 3 and 9 of the above-entitled original act and section 3 of the same as amended by the said act approved Angust 4, 1894, entitled "An act to amend an act to anthorize the construction of a steel bridge over the St. Louis River between the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin," be amended so as to read, respectively, as follows:

"SEC. 3. That the accessory works referred to in the preceding section shall be such booms, dikes, piers, or other suitable and proper structures for confining the flow of water to a permanent channel, and for the guiding of steamboats, rafts, and other water craft safely through the draw and rafting spans, as shall be required by the Secretary of War; and in addition thereto, and before the construction of the bridge to be built under this act, the company or persons owning or holding such bridge shall be required, under the direction of the Secretary of War or such officer as he shall designate, to dredge above and below said bridge to such depth and for such distance as in the judgment of the Secretary of War or of such other officer as he shall designate shall have been rendered necessary by the erection of the piers to said bridge.

designate shall have been removed.

Said bridge.

"SEC. 9. That this act shall be not commenced within one year and completed on or before August 1, A. D. 1897."

SEC. 2. That all acts or parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to inquire if this bill is reported by the committee?

Mr. FLETCHER. It is reported unanimously.

Mr. JENKINS. The bill has been reported by the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JENKINS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SAMUEL C. TOWNE.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 146) granting an increase of pension to Samuel C. Towne.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Samuel C. Towne, late of Company G. Ninth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month, in lieu of that he is now receiving

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LOUD. Let the report be read. The report (by Mr. Sulloway) was read, as follows:

The report (by Mr. Sulloway) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred Senate bill 146, having carefully considered the same, respectfully report:
Claimant was a member of Company G. Eighth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, serving from July 26, 1862, to June 10, 1865. He was pensioned for chronic diarrhea, piles, and injury to back, first receiving $4 per month, which was subsequently increased to $10. His necessities were such that he took advantage of the act of June 27, 1890, and was granted a pension under that act at the rate of $12 per month, which amount he is now drawing.

The pensionable disabilities have continued, and in addition soldier is practically blind, requiring some one to care for him. He is also in destitute circumstances.

There is medical testimony on file to the effect that the blindness resulted from the injury to the back. That is possible, but the proof is not conclusive on that point.

Being now pensioned at the maximum rate under the act of June 27, 1890, no increase can be secured through the regular channel, and hence an appeal is made to Congress.

The bill passed the Senate February 19, 1896. After a careful examination of the evidence your committee are unanimously of the opinion that the bill should pass, and so recommend.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

MARY A. WIDDORES.

Mr. HENDRICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill No. 8788, granting a pension to Mary E. Widdores

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary A. Widdores, of Murray, Ky., widow of Joseph F. Widdores, who served in Company K, Fifth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, and pay her a pension of $20 per month.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LOUD. Let us have the report read, Mr. Speaker. The report (by Mr. Anderson) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8788) granting a pension to Mary A. Widdores, widow of Joseph F. Widdores, late private, Company K. Fifth Ohio Volunteer Cavalry, having carefully examined and considered the facts presented, respectfully report as follows: Joseph F. Widdores enlisted as private, Company K. Fifth Ohio Volunteer Cavalry, October 23, 1861, and served until honorably discharged June 9, 1865, under the name of Joseph F. Widdores. He had no hospital record, never applied for pension, and died near Murray, Ky., November 2, 1889, of "chronic entero colitis."

Applicant was married to Joseph F. Widdores on November 29, 1888. She applied for pension September I, 1890, under act of June 27, 1890, and was pensioned from that date at $8 per month on December 21, 1891.

Applicant filed the testimony of nine neighbors with the committee, who testify that Mary A. Widdores is hopelessly blind and helpless, and that she has no property or income of any kind except her pension of $8 per month, and a little home which she purchased for $300, and on which she has given a mortgage of $300 to a building and loan association, and which property she is liable and likely to lose unless relief is granted her by increase of her pension, and that she has no relatives or others who are able to assist her. Her aged mother (72 years old) is living with her, but can bring but little to her aid.

In yiew of the helpless and reconstitute of the same and the same relative and reconstitute of the same relative and reconstitute of the same relative and reconstitute of the same relative to the same relative and reconstitute of the same relative to the same relative tor the same relative to the same relative to the same relative to aid.

In view of the helpless and necessitous condition of the applicant your committee urgently recommend the passage of the bill, after being amended by striking out "of Murray, Kentucky," in line 6; by striking out "who served," in line 7, and inserting in place thereof "late private," and by inserting the word "Cavalry" between the words "Ohio" and "Volunteers," in lines 7

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman how much this applicant would be entitled to provided she could prove that her husband had died as a result of his service in the

Mr. HENDRICK. I suppose she is receiving the maximum amount now, $8 a month. I do not know whether it would make any difference if she could show that her husband had died as the result of his service.

Mr. LOUD. Then she is receiving the maximum amount to which she is entitled under the law?

Mr. HENDRICK. So I understand. I desire to say to the gentleman, however, that the statements in the report are literally true. This woman is totally blind, her home is about to be taken from her, and she has an aged mother who is more or less dependent upon her.

Mr. LOUD. Still, under the theory of our pension laws, we do not pension widows on account of their own disabilities. I recognize that this is a very pitiful case, but there are a hundred thousand, aye, 300,000, just as bad.

Mr. HENDRICK. I do not believe there are a dozen others in the country as helpless as I know this woman to be.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, yes; I know of several. I shall have to object,

Mr. Speaker.

NANCY HOLLENBANK.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4184) granting a pen-sion to Nancy Hollenbank, formerly Nancy Boaz, formerly Nancy Yeley, a hospital nurse during the war of the rebellion.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, at the rate of $12 per month, the name of Nancy Hollenbank, who was formerly named Nancy Boaz and Nancy Yeley, a hospital nurse in the war of the rebellion, and cause the same to be paid to her quarterly in the same manner as other per-

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Speaker, I think the report ought to be read.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Speaker, I think the report ought to be read.

The report (by Mr. Wood) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4184) granting a pension to Nancy Hollenbank, submit the following report:

Under the army regulations in force at the beginning of the war of the rebellion, enlisted men only could be used as army nurses. After the first battle of Bull Run it was discovered that enlisted men were more useful as soldiers in the field than as nurses in hospitals, so in August, 1881, Congress passed an act which provided "that in general or permanent hospitals female nurses may be substituted for soldiers when, in the opinion of the Surgeon-General or medical officer in charge, it is deemed expedient to do so."

The evidence in this case abundantly shows that Mrs. Hollenbank, who is now over 60 years of age, began serving as an army nurse in the hospital at Paducah, Ky., in September or October, 1861. This hospital was established by Dr. Hamilton, who was then surgeon of the post at Paducah, its regiment then being in charge of said post. When the army moved to the attack of Fort Donelson she was left as a nurse at the Paducah hospital. The wounded from Fort Donelson were removed to that hospital, and she continued giving all her time to her duty as such nurse there under the direction of Surgeon-Hamilton.

In June, 1882, the Paducah hospital was, by order of the Surgeon-General, converted into a general marine hospital, and Mrs. Hollenbank went to the camp hospital at Fort Henry, under the direction of Dr. Hamilton, and from there, in September, 1882, she went, still under the direction of Surgeon Hamilton, as a nurse at the army hospital on the Ohlo River at Mound City, Ill, where she remained on duty as nurse until November, 1882, when this hospital was also made a general hospital, and a new set of surgeons and nurses were installed, and Mrs. Hollenbank, with other nurses, were transferred on duty as a nurse under the direction of the surgeons in have been employed in general hospitals or employed by an authority recognized by the War Department as competent, and have rendered six months' service in any regimental, post, or camp hospital, and being now unable to earn support. Mrs. Hollenbank rendered over two years' service in all these classes of hospitals, under the direction of the army surgeons in charge of them at the time of her service, and it seems very unjust now to deprive her of a pension for the very technical reason now given, that the War Department has no record of the surgeons actually in charge of these hospitals, or is not willing to recognize the regimental, post, camp, or hospital surgeons under whom she served as nurse.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill, with an amendment to the title by striking out the words "formerly Nancy Boaz, formerly Nancy Yeley, a hospital," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "an army;" also, amending bill by striking out between the words "Hollenbank," in line 5, and "nurse," in line 7, the words "who was formerly Nancy Boaz and Nancy Yeley, a hospital," and inserting in lieu thereof "an army; and also by striking out all of the printed bill after the word "rebellion" in line 7.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. COX. I object.

DEWITT EASTMAN.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the bill (H. R. 1628) for the relief of Dewitt Eastman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion from the name of Dewitt Eastman, late of Company B, Second Minnesota Volunteers, and of the Fourth United States Artillery.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MICHAEL KRIES.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 997) for the relief of Michael Kries.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to Michael Kries the sum of $15,872 for property and supplies taken by the United States Army in the year 1864 and used by said Army.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. PAYNE. The report ought to be read, Mr. Speaker. The report (by Mr. LESTER) was read, as follows:

Mr. PAYNE. The report ought to be read, Mr. Speaker.

The report (by Mr. Lester) was read, as follows:

The committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H.R. 997) for the relief of Michael Kries, submit the following report:

The claim is for totacco furnished General Sherman's army in 1864, and for property destroyed by United States troops. Claim stated at $16,872.

Claimant resided in Atlanta, Ga., and furnished General Sherman's army with 4,936 pounds of tobacco, of the value of $4,936.

Claimant filed his claim before the Southern Claims Commission, and that commission disallowed the claim for the reason that they were not convinced of Mr. Kries's loyalty.

The following is from a report of the commissioners of claims on the subject of tobacco furnished the Army:

"Tobacco.—Until the act of March 3, 1885, tobacco was not furnished to the Army. Under that act it has been issued to those who use it, and charged to them on the pay rolls.

"In the claims that have come before us, tobacco has not usually been regarded as a supply, and therefore has been disallowed.

"Claims for tobacco alleged to have been taken and issued to the troops at Atlanta, Ga., under the order of General Sherman of September 8, 1864, are pending before us. The examination of them is still going on, and they will be reported upon hereafter.

"After the capture of Atlanta, in September, 1884, General Sherman found that he was short of rations for his army, and that the soldiers were subject to many privations. To make his army contented, and, as far as possible, to make up to them for their usual rations, of which they were for the time deprived, he issued an order on the 8th of September, 1864, athorizing the chief commissary of subsistence to take possession of and issue to the troops all the tobacco in Atlanta, and give certificates thereof to the owners, to be accounted for in accordance with existing orders.

"Pursuant to this order, tobacco belonging to George J. Stubblefield was taken, and upon his making claim for paym amendments:

In line 6 strike out "16,872" and insert in lieu thereof "4,936."
Strike out the whole of lines 7, 8. and 9 and insert in lieu thereof "4,936 pounds of tobacco furnished the Army of the United States at Atlanta, Ga., during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, which shall be in full discharge of all claims against the United States."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? Mr. PAYNE. I object.

WINSLOW WARREN.

Mr. DRAPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7281) for the relief of Winslow Warren.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to said Winslow Warren the sum of $500, in full for the claim due him as aforesaid.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts what was the extent of this service?

Mr. DRAPER. It was the examination of the files of the court at the time of the change of clerks. The judge appointed Mr. Warren commissioner to examine the files and report to him, and he testifies that the report was worth many thousands of dollars.

Mr. PAYNE. And there is no other way, I understand, of providing for the compensation except by special act?
Mr. DRAPER. No other way except by special act.
The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. COX. I object.

JAMES A. CROUCH.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 710) to remove the charge of desertion against James A. Crouch.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion against James A. Crouch, late of Company I. Thirty-third Regiment Indiana Volunteers, and grant him an honorable discharge as of date January I, 1863.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MRS. LUCY ALEXANDER PAYNE,

Mr. MEREDITH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up and consider at this time the bill (S. 1501) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Lucy Alexander Payne, widow of Capt. J. Scott Payne, Fifth United States Cavalry. The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to put the name of Mrs. Lucy Alexander Payne, widow of Capt. J. Scott Payne, Fifth United States Cavalry, on the pension roll at $30 per month, in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BARRETT objected, but immediately withdrew the objec-

The SPEAKER. The objection is withdrawn. Is there further objection? Mr. COX.

Mr. COX. I object, Mr. Speaker, and demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made and the regular order is demanded. The Chair will first submit a report from the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 1646) providing for certain requirements for vessels propelled by gas, fluid, naphtha, or electric motors; and A bill (S. 1723) to approve and ratify the construction of a bridge across the Red River, between the States of Arkansas and Texas, at a point above the town of Fulton, in Arkansas and river, built by the Texarkana Northern Railway Company, but now owned and operated by the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company, and to authorize the latter company to maintain said bridge over said waterway, subject to certain stipulations and conditions and conditions.

UNLAWFUL USE OF FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the call of committees will proceed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, under that call there is a bill pending and undisposed of, the bill (H. R. 9601) to amend an act entitled "An act providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents," approved January 12,

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee, as the Chair understood, proposed to withdraw that bill. Has he the authority of the committee to do so?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir; I have such authority. I wish to say, if I may be indulged a moment by unanimous consent, that it occurred to the committee that it was necessary to make some it occurred to the committee that it was necessary to make some kind of an amendment to the existing law in order to prohibit the indiscriminate use of the frank of members. That was the object which the committee had in view. But inasmuch as gentlemen on the floor seemed to think that this bill went further than that and would interfere with some of their prerogatives, I thought if any amendment could be agreed on which would obviate that objection without destroying the essential features of the bill, I would cheerfully accept the amendment, so that a proper correction might be made of the existing law. I do not want to withdraw the bill unless gentlemen desire to make radical changes in the franking privilege. If they do, I think it would be best that the bill be withdrawn.

Mr. PAYNE. It has already been withdrawn.
Mr. RICHARDSON. I asked to do so; but objection was made.
The SPEAKER. This matter is proceeding by unanimous con-

Mr. BOUTELLE. I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether the present franking law under which members of Congress are allowed, for departmental and other official business, the use of franking envelopes, was intended to invest members with the same privilege theretofore enjoyed by the heads of Departments and bureaus in the use of the penalty envelope? I will say to the gentleman that, somewhat to my surprise, I have found in the present law a limitation to the weight of 1 ounce as applied to the correspondence of members.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir; that is the law.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I have been trying to look this matter up; and if I am mistaken I want some gentleman familiar with this subject to enlighten me. I understand, contrary to my previous impression, that under the law as it stands—the law of January 112, 1895—the use of these franking envelopes for official or public business of members is limited to 1 ounce.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is right.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But I further understand that the penalty envelopes provided for the use of heads of Departments or bureaus may be used on all public documents, reports, etc., as well as all correspondence which relates entirely to public business, without limitation as to weight.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

The law is not the same in respect to public documents franked by members as it is in respect to correspondence.

Mr. BOUTELLE. When I used the terms "public documents,"

Mr. BOUTELLE. When I used the terms "public documents," I meant correspondence.
Mr. RICHARDSON. In this case the limitation of weight in the case of members is 1 ounce.
Mr. BOUTELLE. But the law as it stands to-day, and as it was enacted years prior to the present law in regard to the privilege of members, permits the use of penalty envelopes by heads of Departments and bureaus for all matters of public or official orrespondence without limitation as to weight.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is correct, as I understand.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Now, in the debate (which I remember very well) at the time this provision was extended to members of Conwell) at the time this provision was extended to members of Congress it was understood, I think, by a majority of members that the change in the law was to extend to members of the House and the Senate and the other officials mentioned the privilege thereto-fore exercised by the heads of Departments for franking to people who had correspondence with them upon matters of purely Government business any response or document that might be involved in the correspondence. I do not think it was generally understood by the transfer of the correspondence of the correspondence of the correspondence. by the House or the Senate that the use of such envelopes by Representatives or Senators was limited to documents not exceeding 1 ounce. I am very sure that I have inadvertently used those envelopes for the transmission of documents that would weigh more than an ounce. Perhaps I ought to have studied the law documents exceeding in weight 1 ounce.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The law does not prevent the sending of documents exceeding in weight 1 ounce.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I spoke of correspondence.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman said "documents."

Mr. BOUTELLE. Well, in speaking of documents, I did not mean printed books; I used the word "documents" as applied, for instance, to a report of the Secretary of State, in manuscript. When I have made an inquiry of the Secretary of State, for instance, in regard to some business pending between our State Department and some foreign government in relation to a ship, or the right of an American citizen, and in reply to my inquiry the the right of an American citizen, and in reply to my inquiry the Secretary of State has forwarded to me (as he did in relation to the Armenian difficulty some time ago) an official reply inclosing other official communications on very heavy paper, weighing undoubtedly considerably more than an ounce, I have not hesitated to place that in one of these franked envelopes and to send it to the party with whom I was corresponding. I did so because I was laboring under the impression that the envelopes provided for the use of members of the House and the Senate carried with them exactly the same privilege that had been extended to the Departments and bureaus under the old system.

Now, in order to make this matter clear, let me suppose this case. I send a communication from some constituent of mine if case: I send a communication from some constituent of mine, if you please, to the Secretary of the Treasury making a certain inquiry in regard to public business. The Secretary of the Treasury replies to me; and his reply would weigh 4 ounces. Now, it seems under the present construction that I can be permitted to make some kind of a reply to my constituent in which I may inclose an ounce of that correspondence, but for the other 8 ounces I have got to secure stamps, put it in another envelope, and pay the legitimate postage on it. I do not believe that that was the understanding of the members; nor do I think it was their the understanding of the members; nor do't difficult was then intention in passing that act.

It covers all correspondence in which members of the House or of the Senate are called upon to take action in dealing with their constituents; and frequently, in reference to requests made in the various Departments of the Government for information, covernments of the correspondence are interested, the correspondence in which individuals are interested, the correspondence in which individuals are interested. ing matters in which individuals are interested, the correspondence is more or less voluminous and could not come under this ounce rule. That, of course, has to be transmitted through the mails, under this construction, at the cost of the member himself. My understanding has been that the purpose of the law was to enable the members of Congress to transact their business with their constituents, without personal expense as far as practicable to themselves, and therefore to transmit, under the franking privilege, any legitimate correspondence, with any of the Departments of the Government, and with a constituent, concerning public business of the United States, that all such matters shall hereafter be protected by the frank of the departmental officers, under the penalty-envelope system; and I certainly think if there is any reason for the maintenance of the law at all, it ought not to be limited to the weight of an ounce. It would be very difficult be limited to the weight of an ounce. It would be very difficult for a member to adjust his correspondence on that basis.

for a member to adjust his correspondence on that basis.

For instance, it is common in our correspondence with the Departments—more common formerly than it is now—to have a reply returned to the member asking for the information, stating that it was "inclosed herewith," and there would be also inclosed a letter to the person making the inquiry, and an envelope directed to that person, supplied with the frank of the Department to carry it through the mails. It was regarded, as I remember, at the time this matter was under discussion in the House, a somewhat of an indignity upon members of Congress that we should invest the heads of divisions, or the chief clerks of the Departments of the Government, with a power to grant in their partments of the Government, with a power to grant, in their discretion, to us the privilege of using a franked envelope to transdiscretion, to us the privilege of using a franked envelope to transmit business correspondence between the Department and our constituents with which we were legitimately connected. And you can readily see how that will operate now. If we receive from the Departments a reply to an inquiry, and the departmental officer should see fit, in his discretion and liberality, to send an addressed envelope with the frank of the Department upon it, we could send the correspondence under that frank. But if he did not, we would be obliged to write a letter within the ounce limit to our constituent, and then pay postage on the response of the hot, we would be obliged to write a letter within the odince limit to our constituent, and then pay postage on the response of the Department on the remainder and send it in another envelope.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman allow a suggestion just there?

Mr. BOUTELLE. In a moment. I only wish to make a brief steement, and do not wish to trespass upon the patience of the

It seems to me to be a matter that seriously concerns us all, and I make the suggestion that I personally, as a member of the House, should not be willing to assist in the reenactment of that condition, if that is the construction. We certainly would not have voted for it if we had been aware of the fact that such a limitation was placed upon this right at the time.

I think I would prefer, for my own part, not to have the franking privilege at all, unless the members of the House and Senate can be invested with this privilege for the transmission of the same character of public correspondence which we have by law accorded to all of the Departments of the Government, to be used at their dispartion.

at their discretion.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman allow me?
Mr. BOUTELLE. Certainly; I have concluded what I desired to say.

Mr. LOUD. I hope the gentleman will retain the floor for a moment.

It seems to me that this penalty which is proposed to be invoked here should be enacted into a law.

Whether the franking privilege should be extended or not is an entirely different question, which we think should come before the House on its merits, and not in connection with a bill of this charac-There is to-day an indiscriminate and unwarranted use of the franks of the members of this body. I say an indiscriminate use, and I apply the term with a perfect knowledge of the facts, Mr. BOUTELLE. I do not think that is so. I believe the geneman is mistaken. I have no knowledge of it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I do not think that is so. I believe the gentleman is mistaken. I have no knowledge of it.

Mr. LOUD. I will state to the gentleman from Maine that it is absolutely true. It is a fact to my own knowledge. A large number of documents have come back to me with my frank on them; and I do not know who has used that frank. I have in my pocket to-day, that I presented to the House on yesterday, a return register receipt on which they sent a document privileged by Congress and, I suppose, necessarily, bearing my frank. I do not know the man who sent it. Certainly he had no authority.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But you can easily call him to account.

Mr. LOUD. That I am trying to find out, permit me to say; but there is no law or penalty for such unlawful use of it at present. Now, the gentleman well knows that the abuse of the franking privilege a number of years ago was what caused its repeal. The

Now, the gentleman well knows that the abuse of the franking privilege a number of years ago was what caused its repeal. The indiscriminate use of the frank of members brought it into discredit before the country. Now, if this House wants, when the question is up for discussion, to extend the weight of such frankable matter, let us do it on that proposition. But personally I do not think it wise, because the ease with which the frank of a do not think it wise, because the ease with which the frank of a member is used permitted, as in days gone by, as has been strongly intimated, the sending of washing 500 miles and its return through the mails. There is a legitimate privilege extended to members in this matter of public correspondence. Let us see that it is used with care and discretion, and circumscribe it as nearly and as closely as possible by law. But if we open the doors, then the abuse becomes so great that we must deny ourselves a privilege that we should legitimately enjoy.

Mr. EVANS. May I ask the gentleman a question?
The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from California yield?
Mr. BOUTELLE. I hold the floor by unanimous consent and yielded to the gentleman from California [Mr. Loud] at his request.

yielded to the gentleman from California [Mr. Loud] at his request.

Mr. BOWERS. The gentleman had taken his seat.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Oh, no. I was requested by the gentleman from California [Mr. Loud] to retain the floor.

Mr. EVANS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BOUTELLE. I wish to say just a word, and then anybody can have the floor. The gentleman from California [Mr. Loud] is addressing himself to something to which I made no reference whatever. I see that in applying this penalty we reenact the present law, and however I might act or vote in regard to applying a penalty for the misuse of franks, I will not vote to reenact that law as it stands, because I understand it to-day as I did not understand it before, and I will not vote for this proposition because I can see no possible reason, if you should change this law, why you can not put it in such shape as we want it to remain in—

Mr. LOUD. We do not change the law.
Mr. BOUTELLE (continuing). Why we should not recommit the bill and then bring in a law in the form in which we want

Mr. HOPKINS. Why can we not amend it here?
Mr. BOUTELLE. Let the committee amend it and put it into reasonable shape, or let us do it now. I want an opportunity to move to strike out that limitation. I want the people of this country to trust me to use a frank for the transmission of correspond-try to trust me to use a frank for the transmission of correspondence upon the public business, just as this House and the Senate have, over and over again, trusted to the honesty, the integrity, and the discretion of the departmental clerks of this Government.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARRETT. The RECORD shows that the gentleman from Tennessee yesterday withdrew the bill. I should like a decision of the Chair as to whether the bill is now pending before the House. House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman announced that it was by authority of the committee, and the Chair thinks that in accordance with previous rulings he would have the right to withdraw ance with previous rulings he would have the right to withdraw the bill.

Mr. BARRETT. The point is that the RECORD shows that the gentleman did, last night, in terms withdraw the bill. I ask if the bill is now pending.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not now pending. The Chair has already stated that it was by unanimous consent that all this discussion took place, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] stated the same.

Mr. BARRETT. I desire to ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. If there is any objection to the continuance of the discussion, the Chair will bring it to an end.

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Speaker, am I recognized?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman, unless there is objection.

Mr. BARRETT. I shall object, unless the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Richardson] will afford me an opportunity to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Clerk will proceed with the call.

The Committee on the Judiciary was called.

APPEALS IN CRIMINAL CASES.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up Senate

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], chairman of the Judiciary Committee, presents a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of section 5 of the act entitled "An act to establish circuit courts of appeals and to define and regulate in certain cases the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891, as reads "in cases of conviction of a capital or otherwise infamous crime," be amended by striking out the words "or otherwise infamous," so that the same will read "in cases of conviction of a capital crime;" and that appeals or writs of error may be taken from the district courts or circuit courts to the proper circuit court of appeals in cases of conviction of an infamous crime not capital: Provided, That no case now pending in the Supreme Court or in which an appeal or writ of error shall have been taken or sued out before the passage of this act shall be hereby affected; but in all such cases the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court shall remain, and said Supreme Court shall proceed therein as if this act had not been passed.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say to the House that this bill was called up at the last session of Congress, under a suspension of the rules, and failed to receive the necessary two-thirds vote. It was then antagonized by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Culberson], who has since examined the authorities and the law, and is now favorable to the passage of the bill.

The purpose of it is simply to cut of expects from the circuit.

and the law, and is now favorable to the passage of the bill.

The purpose of it is simply to cut off appeals from the circuit courts of appeals to the Supreme Court in criminal cases other than capital. Capital cases may yet be appealed, and I desire to say that until the act of 1891 this power was never given to the Supreme Court. We have now pending in the Supreme Court over forty cases, many of them of a petty character, taking up the time of the Supreme Court and blocking the other legitimate and proper business of that court. I believe this bill to be needed and to be in line with the spirit of legislation which gave us the court of appeals, which was for the purpose of relieving the Supreme Court of the more inferior class of cases.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. HENDERSON. I will now yield to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER] who reported the bill.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly.
Mr. NORTHWAY. How does it affect the right of appeal from the district courts of the United States to the court of appeals?
Mr. HENDERSON. It does not interfere with that. That is not interfered with.

Mr. NORTHWAY. It does not interfere with that; it only interferes with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court?

Mr. HENDERSON. That is all.

Mr. McMILLIN. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this jurisdiction was only conferred on the Supreme Court in 1891?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. McMILLIN. That the jurisdiction over the class of offenses now to be taken from the Supreme Court had only been cognizable.

now to be taken from the Supreme Court had only been cognizable now to be taken from the Supreme Court had only been cognizable by the Supreme Court in 1891?

Mr. HENDERSON. That is right, sir.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, at present I ask to have the report of the Attorney-General, where I have marked it, upon this subject read. This is his report for 1896, and his report for 1895 is in equally strong terms; but I will not ask that that he read at present that be read at present

The Clerk read as follows:

CRIMINAL APPEALS.

CRIMINAL APPEALS.

The unfortunate results of the present law governing writs of error to the Supreme Court in criminal cases are still apparent. Defendants in criminal cases are generally poor. It is hard for them to obtain counsel to defend them at home, but it is generally beyond their power to obtain counsel to argue their cases before the Supreme Court. While the criminal jurisdiction of that court is now so extensive as to take up a considerable part of the time spent by the justices in the study of records and briefs, yet the oral arguments of these cases are, largely for the reason above stated, comparatively few. They are mainly confined to cases against the wealthier classes of defendants, such as sungglers and bank officers.

The questions raised in these criminal cases are for the most part comparatively trivial and not of general importance. I think that a transfer of the criminal appeals to the circuit courts of appeals, with the present system of permitting important questions to be presented to the Supreme Court by certification, is highly desirable for various reasons. It would enable more defendants to have their cases orally argued instead of being submitted upon briefs. It would save the very large amount of time which is now spent by the Supreme Court in studying large records of cases involving comparatively unimportant questions, and would thus probably very soon result in the clearing of the dockets, so that cases could be argued and decided without the present long delays. It would not cut off the right of review by the Supreme Court of important questions, for the courts are very regardful of the interests of defendants in criminal cases, and if the circuit courts of appeals should fail to certify such questions when asked to do so, the Supreme Court could readily bring them before it by the writ of certiorari, and, I am advised, would adopt the practice of doing so. Questions would then be sharply and clearly presented, disencumbered from the voluminous records in which they are now often hidden, the cost of printing which is alone very great and generally falls on the Government.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, unless some question is to be asked, as this is a united report of the Committee on the Judiciary, I shall ask for a vote.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the bill (H. R. 6834) to prevent the purchasing of or speculating in claims against the Federal Government by United States officers, and I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Gillett] who reported the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6834) to prevent the purchasing of or speculating in claims against the Federal Government by United States officers, recommend its passage.

The main abuse against which this bill is aimed is the purchase by officers of the courts of witness fees at much less than their face value, and thereby not only are the witnesses taken advantage of and deprived of their proper compensation, but inducement is created for the officers to promote unnec essary litigation. There are many other cases where the present practice is permicious which this bill would remedy, and the few possible cases where it might work hardship are deemed by the committee insignificant compared with those where its operation would be beneficial.

CONVENTION OF AMERICAN INSTRUCTORS OF THE DEAF.

Mr. HENDERSON. I now call up the bill (H. R. 6883) to incorporate the Convention of American Instructors of the Deaf. The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Edward M. Gallaudet, of Washington, in the District of Columbia; Francis D. Clarke, of Flint, in the State of Michigan; S. Tefft Walker, of Jacksonville, in the State of Illinois; James L. Smith, of Faribault, in the State of Minnesota; Sarah Fuller, of Boston, in the State of Massachusetts; David C. Dudley, of Colorado Springs, in the State of Colorado, and John R. Dobyns, of Jackson, in the State of Mississippi, officers and members of the Convention of American Instructors of the Deaf, and their associates and successors, be, and they are hereby, incorporated and made a body politicand corporate in the District of Columbia by the name of the "Convention of American Instructors of the Deaf," for the promotion of the education of the deaf on the broadest, most advanced, and practical lines; and by that name it may sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, in any court of law or equity, and may have and use a common seal and change the same at pleasure.

That the said corporation shall have the power to take and hold personal estate and such real estate as shall be necessary and proper for the promotion of the educational and benevolent purposes of said corporation, which shall not be divided among the members of the corporation, but shall descend to their successors for the promotion of the objects aforesaid.

SEC 3. That said corporation shall have a constitution and regulations or by-laws, and shall have power to amend the same at pleasure: Provided, That snot constitution and regulations or by-laws do not conflict with the laws of the United States or of any State.

SEC 4. That said association may hold its meetings in such places as said incorporators shall determine, and shall report to Congress, through the president of the Columbia institution for the Deaf and Dumbat Washington, D. C., such portions of its proceedings and transactions as its officers shall deem to be of general public interest and value concerning the education of the deaf.

Mr. COX. I desire to have an explanation of that bill. Mr. HENDERSON. An explanation would be best given by what is said in the report:

The incorporators are actively interested in promoting the education of the deaf and dumb and desire a corporate organization that they may more effectively and systematically carry on their efforts, and that gifts and legacies for the purpose may be encouraged and preserved. It is purely a charitable and educational organization.

This is done at the instance of Professor Gallaudet, who is really This is done at the instance of Professor Gallaudet, who is really the father of this great work of educating the deaf and dumb. The bill was introduced by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Ding-LEY], and has been pressed upon us by all who take an interest in this matter. It is simply to incorporate them, in order that they may more effectively carry on their efforts.

Mr. BAILEY. I think I understand the bill makes this a District expectation.

Mr. HENDERSON. Well, it is an organization in the District of Columbia, as I understand it.

Mr. BAILEY. Then that is all right.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is expressly so stated in the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HENDERSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Platt, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 8676) to enable the town of Flagstaff, in the Territory of Arizona, to issue bonds to construct a water system; and A bill (H. R. 4538) for the relief of John Keefe.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1424) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend section 4178, Revised Statutes, in relation to the marking of vessels' names at bow and stern, and also to provide for marking the draft," approved February 21, 1891.

POLICE COURT JURISDICTION, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 3623) to amend section 4 of an act entitled "An act to define the jurisdiction of the police court of the District of Columbia," and I yield to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER] who reported

The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4 of the act entitled "An act to define the jurisdiction of the police court of the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1891, be, and the same hereby is, so amended as to read as follows:

"Sec. 4. That in all cases tried before said court the judgment of the court shall be final, except as hereinafter provided. If, upon the trial of any such cause, an exception be taken by or on behalf of any defendant to any ruling or instruction of the court upon matter of law, the same shall be reduced to writing and stated in a bill of exceptions, with so much of the evidence as may be material to the question or questions raised, which said bill of exceptions shall be settled and signed by the judge within such time as may be prescribed by rules and regulations which shall be made by the court of appeals of the District of Columbia for the transaction of business to be brought before it under this act, and for the time and method of the entry of appeals, and for giving notice of writs of error thereto from the police court of the District of Columbia; and if, upon presentation to any justice of the court of appeals of the District of Columbia of a verified petition setting forth the matter or matters so excepted to, such justice shall be of opinion that the same ought to be reviewed, he may allow a writ of error in the cause, which shall issue out of the said court of appeals, addressed to the judge of the police court, who shall forthwith send up the information filed in the cause and a transcript of the record therein, certified under the seal of said court, to said court of appeals for review and such action as the law may require, which record shall be filed in said court of appeals within such time as may be prescribed by the court of appeals, as hereinbefore provided. Any defendant desiring the benefit of the provisions of this section shall give notice in open court of his intention to apply for a writ of error upon such exceptions, and thereupon proceedings therein shall be stayed for ten days: Provided. That the defendant shall then and there enter into recognizance with sufficient surety, to be approved by the judge of the police court, conditioned that in the event of a denial of his application for a writ of error he will, within five days next after the expiration of said ten days, appear in said police court and abide by and perform its judgment, and that in the event of the granting of such writ of error he will appear in said court of appeals of the District of Columbia and prosecute the writ of error and abide by and perform its judgment in the premises. Upon failure of any defendant to enter into the recognizance provided for in this section the sentence of the police court shall stand and be executed pending proceedings upon his application for a writ of error and until the final disposition thereof by the said court of appeals.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the report be read. It is quite brief.

The report (by Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3823) entitled "A bill to amend section 4 of an act entitled "An act to define the jurisdiction of the police court of the District of Columbia," "having had the same under consideration, beg to submit the following report:

By section 4 of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1891 (28 Stat. L., 849), writs of error in matters of law were authorized from the police court of the District of Columbia to the supreme court of the said District upon the approval of a judge of that court.

This provision of the statute was satisfactory to both the bench and the bar, but was repealed by the act creating the court of appeals of the District, approved February 9, 1893 (27 Stat. L., 436). This repeal was incidental, and so far as appeals from the police court were concerned, was probably inadvertent. The act referred to destroyed the general appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court of the District, and did not authorize writs of error from the police court to the court of appeals.

The purpose of the present bill is to restore writs of error on law points from the police court, by permitting such writs to the court of appeals of the District upon the approval of any justice of that court.

Section 4 of the said act is unchanged in other particulars, and your committee report the bill and recommend its passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and

AUDRAIN COUNTY, MO.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 9901) to detach the county of Audrain from the western district of Missouri and to attach the same to the eastern district of said State

The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the county of Audrain, in the State of Missouri, be, and the same is hereby, detached from the western judicial district of the State of Missouri and attached to the eastern judicial district of said State of Missouri.

SEC. 2. That all process, civil and criminal, hereafter issued against persons residing in said county of Audrain shall be made returnable to the courts held at St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, and all suits and prosecutions now pending in the circuit or district courts of the United States against persons residing in the said county of Audrain, at Jefferson City, in said State of Missouri, shall be determined in said courts.

Mr. HENDERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BURTON] who reported the bill.
Mr. BURTON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, this is simply a change of this county from one district to the other as a matter of convenience. This legislation is prayed for generally by the bar of that county who practice in the Federal courts, and I believe the the bill ought to pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BURTON of Missouri, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill passed was laid on the table.

DEPUTY MARSHALS, INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up Senate bill No. 3050, to validate the appointments, acts, and services of certain deputy United States marshals in the Indian Territory, and for other

The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the appointments of deputy United States marshals in the Indian Territory made by the marshal in either district of said Territory since the 1st day of March, 1895, and prior to April 15, 1896, and all oaths taken by such deputy United States marshals in good faith, and all acts and services rendered by such deputy United States marshals in pursuance of law and in good faith, are hereby ratified and validated. All accounts for the payment of such deputy United States marshals shall be subject to the approval of the Attorney-General.

Sec. 2. That hereafter United States marshals in said Territory shall give bond, with two or more sureties to be approved by the judge of said district, in the sum of $20,000, conditioned as by law required in regard to the bond of other United States marshals: Provided, That whenever the business of the courts in said Territory shall make it necessary, in the opinion of the Attorney-General, for the United States marshal of any district therein to furnish greater security than the official bond herein required, a bond in the sum not exceeding $50,000 shall be given by said marshal when required by the Attorney-General, who shall fix the amount thereof.

Mr. HENDERSON. I vield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr.

Mr. HENDERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Speaker, the act organizing the courts in the Indian Territory provided for the appointment of a marshal in each district, and also provided for the appointment of a marshal in each district, and also provided for the appointment of deputy marshals by the marshals. Under the law the deputies were required to take the oath of office before the judges of the several districts, but in fact many of them who were appointed took the oath before the clerks, the judges not being present. There was no provision in the statute authorizing the taking of the oath of office before the clerk in the absence of the judge, but these deputies did it and then went on and rendered service. An appropriation has been made for payment for their services, but the accounts have not been audited or paid. This bill is intended simply to legalize what has been done irregularly, but in good faith; and the services of these men have been actually rendered. This is a Senate bill, and the Committee on the Judiciary has reported the bill just as it passed the Senate.

Mr. HULICK. This is to confirm what has been done without authority of law; but does it also authorize the clerks to administer the oath of office to deputies?

Mr. BRODERICK. No; the statute provides that the judge

Mr. BRODERICK. No; the statute provides that the judge shall administer the oath.

Mr. HULICK. That is the provision in the existing statute; but does your bill provide for clerks swearing in these officials, the very thing that you are now proposing to ratify?

Mr. BRODERICK. No; it simply legalizes what has been done in this respect.

Mr. HULICK. Then why not authorize the clerks of these courts to administer the oaths?

Mr. BRODERICK. We propose to do that in another bill which is now pending before the committee. The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BRODERICK, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, the committee has no further business to call up at this time.

OLEOMARGARINE, ETC.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 1221) to make eleomargarine and all other imitation dairy products subject to the laws of the State or Territory into which they are transported.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all articles known as eleomargarine, butterine, imitation butter, or imitation cheese, or any substance in the semblance of butter or cheese not the usual product of the dairy and not made exclusively of pure and unadulterated milk or cream, transported into any State or Territory, or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall, upon arrival in such State or Territory be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory enacted in the exercise of its police powers to the same extent and in the same manner as though such articles or substances had been produced in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, the member of the committee having this matter in charge being unavoidably absent at this time, I yield to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Grout] who introduced the bill.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, I think this subject can not be better presented to the House than by the reading of the report of the committee, which quite fully explains the necessity for this legislation.

The report (by Mr. Wilber) was read, as follows:

The report (by Mr. Wilber) was read, as follows:

The committee on Agriculture, to whom was referred House bill 1221, makes the following report:

The object sought to be obtained by the legislation proposed by this bill is to place oleomargarine and all other imitation dairy products under the regulation of the laws in the States and Territories into which such articles shall have been transported from other States for sale.

The doctrine was announced by our Supreme Court in the case of Leisy vs. Hardin, known as the "original package" decision, that where any article of commerce is manufactured in one State and transported into another State and placed on the market, that the sale of such article of commerce should be protected to the extent of one transfer while the goods remained in the original package, and until they became part of the commercial products of the State into which they were shipped.

The Agricultural Committee, to whom was referred this bill, has given the subject careful consideration, and recommend the passage of this bill with the following amendment:

In line 9, after the word "arrival," erase the word "in," and substitute the words "within the limits of."

Most of the States of the Union, it seems, have passed laws regulating the sale of eleomargarine, etc. These laws, so far as the committee has been able to ascertain, do not prohibit either the manufacture or sale, at wholessale or retail, of these articles; but all such legislation of the States seems to be for the purpose of preventing the sale of eleomargarine, etc., for butter, etc., in other words, no exception has been taken to the sale of oleomargarine, etc. under the sale of the sale of the sale of imitation articles as the genuine, and it seems that most of the States have upon their statute books laws of this character; but as soon as the "original package" decision was rendered, the dealers in oleomargarine and other imitation dairy products saw an opportunity by which they could evade those laws and effect at least one s the market, and the sale of said imitation dairy products as genuine immensely increased.

The opponents of this bill place their opposition on the grounds that the farmer will receive decreased prices for the ingredients used in the manufacture of these imitation products; and that it is an oppression to the poor man, preventing him from buying a cheap substitute for the genuine dairy product, palatable and wholesome in its character.

The first objection is too trivial to be seriously considered. No honest farmer expects a permanent demand for any of his products except for honest and legitimate purposes. As to the second ground of opposition, it is a well-known fact that no one ever purchases oleomargarine or any other imitation dairy product, knowing it to be such, except the dealers and persons who may conduct restaurants, boarding houses, and hotels. No man ever buys it for family use, knowing it to be imitation; and when the laboring man does buy it for family use, he pays about the same price to the retail dealer that he would pay for the genuine article, for the simple reason that if the retail dealer made any great difference in the price between the genuine and the imitation article it would expose the fraud, and the consumer would purchase the genuine and not the imitation article. But the enormous profits to the retail dealer induces him to palm off the imitation article whenever an opportunity offers.

The manufacturers of pure dairy products have never asked for prohibitory laws as to the manufacture or sale of the imitation dairy products, but they have, with much force and unquestioned justice, insisted that these said imitation dairy products shall be sold upon their merits, and not disposed of to unsuspecting consumers as the genuine article; and it seems to the committee that an interest so large and important as the dairy interests of the United States—an interest the yearly products of which amount to $1,000,000,000—should be recognized in any reasonable legislative demands.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, it would seem to me that there

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, it would seem to me that there ought not to be any necessity for discussing this bill, but I have just been informed by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WIL-LIAMS] that he would like to be heard upon it. Of course there is no objection to that, and I now yield to the gentleman such time as he may desire to present his views.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, this is one of those measures which look very innocent upon their face, but mean a great deal, and it is proper that Congress should know, before it enacts it into law, just exactly what the bill does mean. This is a bill to annihilate the interstate-commerce feature of the Constitution of the United States in so far as it protects dealing in oleomargarine. The bill reads that-

All articles known as oleomargarine, butterine, imitation butter, or imitation cheese, or any substance in the semblance of butter or cheese not the product of the dairy and not made exclusively of pure and unadulterated milk or cream, when transported into any State or Territory, or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall, upon arrival within the limits of such State or Territory, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory.

That means not only all such laws as now exist in the said States or Territories, but all laws that may, after the passage of this bill, be enacted by such States or Territories. It puts oleomargarine, a wholesome product, upon the same footing with whisky, and takes the same measures with regard to it that Congress took after the "original-package" decision of the Supreme Court in the case of whisky to stamp out dealing in it in interstate commerce, to prevent its being protected in the States by the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States. Now, understand me distinctly. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to any understand me distinctly, Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to any bill which the gentleman will introduce here which forbids any transaction in commerce between the States in oleomargarine, or in butterine, or in anything else, when shipped or sold under any name except its own name, or under any guise or semblance except its own.

its own.

Mr. GROUT. That is all that this bill provides.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is not all that this bill provides. This bill does exactly as to oleomargarine what the whisky legislation which followed the "original-package" decision did as to whisky. It absolutely prohibits, for instance, within the State of Vermont, dealings in oleomargarine or any similar products, whether sold as oleomargarine or as butter if the State chooses to enact such a prohibition. This bill will absolutely enable Pennsylvania or any other State of the Union having dairy products which come into competition more or less with these other products to stamp these competing food products altogether out of existence within the competing food products altogether out of existence within the State, just as they may stamp out whisky or any other poisonous or deleterious substance—to prohibit its sale or manufacture in or importation into the State.

Now, sir, oleomargarine and similar products are not whisky, are not upon the same footing, are not injurious to the human race. All the testimony that was brought before the committee shows that these articles are made of wholesome substances and are as healthful and as fit for use as food by the human race as butter made from the milk of the cow.

I concede that the dairy farmers have a right to complain if these products are sold, as they too frequently are, for butter. People should not be deceived into buying oleomargarine thinking that they are buying butter. If the gentleman will introduce a bill seeking to prevent such deception, and closing, if you choose, the channels of interstate commerce altogether to the access of any product, I care not what, which passes under a name not its own—which assumes a deceptive semblance or guise—that will be all right. But when the gentleman attempts to take a product made of the oil of cotton seed, from lard, from various other things, vegetable oils, etc., products perfectly pure and whole-some, much purer and more wholesome as a rule than butter— and when he proposes to enable the State of Vermont, for instance, to stamp out of existence commerce in these products, because their sale conflicts with the sale at higher prices of certain products of the people of the State of Vermont, then, Mr. Chairman, he is undertaking to make the Constitution, which was intended to protect us all, a shield of defense for a part of the country and a sword of attack against another part.

This sort of legislation may be justifiable in the case of whisky, This sort of legislation may be justifiable in the case of whisky, upon the broad and general ground of the conviction of humanity that whisky is injurious to the human race and that its sale ought to be prohibited or regulated, or at any rate upon the ground that the community ought to have the right to prohibit or regulate it because of its injurious character, or because they think it injurious, whether it is so or not—in short, because whisky, like lotteries and gambling, falls within the "police powers" of the State. But no man can assert that these products are of that character. character.

I ask gentlemen of the House to pause before taking a step which will be a precedent for the Iliad of all our woes in the way of a certain class of new legislation, new legislation in the direction of making the Constitution of the United States, or at least a particular clause of it, a thing which shall protect some products of some sections everywhere, while it shall not protect others anywhere in the rights guaranteed to them by the Federal Constitution in matters of legitimate interstate commerce.

Now, let me read this bill and ask whether I can possibly be mistaken in my construction of it. Leaving out repetitions, it provides

That all articles known as oleomargarine-not made exclusively of pure and unadulterated milk or cream, transported into any State or Territory, or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall, upon arrival within the limits of such State or Territory, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory enacted in the exercise of its police powers—

"Of its police powers!" It will be seen that the bill puts the suppression or extinction of these products upon exactly the same footing as the suppression of gambling or whisky or a hundred other things of that sort, the "police powers" of the State being so broad that it has been held by the courts that the Constitution of the United States does not contemplate any interference of any description by the General Government with them.

I say my statement that after this bill is passed any State of this Union may pass a law to prohibit the sale of cleomargarine in its natural color, under its own name, is undeniable—is a correct statement of the effect of this measure.

The clause which I have already read continues—

The clause which I have already read continues to the same extent and in the same manner as though such articles or substances had been produced in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages

Thus it will be seen that these products, if any State chooses to prohibit them, may be within that State entirely stamped out. And, of course, a great dairy State—any dairy State—would choose to make the prohibition, because these products, even in their own semblance and under their own name, furnish a food product own semblance and under their own name, furnish a food product which enables humanity to eat something besides butter, and hence make butter somewhat cheaper. At any rate, that is the ground upon which the legislation would be based.

Now, I ask members of Congress to reflect before they take again in this case a step which was a doubtful precedent in the case of whisky, and only justified in that case by the character of the product itself. In that instance Congress went out of its way to pass a law which it would not have passed in relation to any other substance, in relation to any food product. In this case you are asked to take a perfectly wholesome product—pure vegetable oil, much purer than the average butter, much more wholesome oil, much purer than the average butter, much more wholesome as food than ordinary butter—and treat it to a dose of the "police powers" of any section of the country with whose products it may happen to come into competition—coming into competition, mark you, not as butter, but as what it really is. Whenever you propose to prevent articles of this description from competing as butter—under the name and semblance of butter—with genuine butter—under the hame and semiciance of butter. I am ready to go with you; but we must not give to any State of the Union the right, under the broad police powers of a sovereign State, to prohibit absolutely the manufacture and sale of the wholesome product of other States under their own name and in their own color. I thank the gentleman for the time he has yielded me.

Mr. COX. If I understand the gentleman correctly, his opposition to this bill is based on the ground that it prohibits any of these products, such as oleomargarine, from being sold in a State.
Mr. WILLIAMS. No, sir; but the bill will enable any State, after the measure takes effect, to prohibit the manufacture or sale of such product if it chooses.

Mr. COX. Suppose that the State does make such a prohibition—and that is the object of the bill, as I understand the gentleman-

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is one of the possible and natural and necessary effects, whether it is or is not one of its objects. I think myself that it is one of its objects; but I do not like to make that statement, because other gentlemen here are of course the fairest judges of their own motives. But that is one of the possible effects of the measure.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry to find my friend from Mississippi so exercised about the effect of this bill. He says that on its face it is harmless, but that concealed within it is all manner of mischief and wickedness.

He says he is in favor of having oleomargarine go upon the market for just what it is, and then declares that this bill will accomplish some other terrible purpose, but does not make it clear what calamity will follow, and to prove his words reads a clause from the bill.

Now, allow me to read the whole bill, which is very short. It is as follows:
